PART ONE

1906-1923

April 18, 1906
 Monim, Poland

She only stopped screaming when she died. It was then that she started to scream.

The young boy who was hunting rabbits in the forest was not sure whether it was the woman's last cry or the child's first that alerted his youthful ears. He turned suddenly, sensing the possible danger, his eyes searching for an animal that was so obviously in pain. He had never known any animal to scream in quite that way before. He edged toward the noise cautiously; the scream had now turned to a whine, but it still did not sound like any animal he knew. He hoped it would be small enough to kill; at least that would make a change from rabbit for dinner.

The young hunter moved stealthily toward the river, where the strange noise came from, running from tree to tree, feeling the protection of the bark against his shoulder blades, something to touch. Never stay in the open, his father had taught him. When he reached the edge of the forest, he had a clear line of vision all the way down the valley to the river, and even then it took him some time to realize that the strange cry emanated from no ordinary animal. He continued to creep toward the whining, but he was out in the open on his own now. Then suddenly he saw the woman, with her dress above her waist, her bare legs splayed wide apart. He had never seen a woman like that before. He ran quickly to her side and stared down at her belly, quite frightened of a small, damp, pink animal, attached only by something that looked like rope. The young hunter dropped his free skinned rabbits and collapsed on his knees beside the little creature.

He gazed for a long, stunned moment and then turned his eyes toward the woman, immediately regretting the decision. She was already blue with cold; her tired twenty-three-year-old face looked middle-aged to the boy; he did not need to be told that she was dead. He picked up the slippery little body—had you asked him why, and no one ever did, he would have told you that the tiny fingernails clawing the crumpled face had worried him—and then he became aware that mother and child were inseparable because of the slimy rope.

He had watched the birth of a lamb a few days earlier and he tried to remember. Yes, that's what the shepherd had done, but dare he, with a child? The whining had stopped and he sensed that a decision was now urgent. He unsheathed his knife, the one he had skinned the rabbits with, wiped it on his sleeve and, hesitating only for a moment, cut the rope close to the child's body. Blood flowed freely from the severed ends. Then what had the shepherd done when the lamb was born? He had tied a knot to stop the blood. Of course, of course. He pulled some long grass out of the earth beside him and hastily tied a crude knot in the cord. Then he took the child in his arms. He rose slowly from his knees, leaving behind him three dead rabbits and a dead woman who had given birth to this child. Before finally turning his back on the mother, he put her legs together and pulled her dress down over her knees. It seemed to be the right thing to do.

"Holy God," he said aloud, the first thing he always said when he had done something very good or very bad. He wasn't yet sure which this was.

The young hunter then ran toward the cottage where he knew his mother would be cooking supper, waiting only for his rabbits; all else would be prepared. She would be wondering how many he might have caught today; with a family of eight to feed, she needed at least three. Sometimes he managed a duck, a goose or even a pheasant that had strayed from the Baron's estate, on which his father worked. Tonight he had caught a different animal, and when he reached the cottage the young hunter dared not let go of his prize even with one hand, so he kicked at the door with his bare foot until his mother opened it. Silently, he held out his offering to her. She made no immediate move to take the creature from him but stood, one hand on her breast, gazing at the wretched sight

"Holy God," she said, and crossed herself. The boy stared up at his mother's face for some sign of pleasure or anger. Her eyes were now showing a tenderness the boy had never seen in them before. He knew then that the thing he had done must be good.

"Is it a baby, Matka?"

"It's a little boy," said his mother, nodding sorrowfully. "Where did you find him?"

"Down by the river, Matka," he said.

"And the mother?"

"Dead."

She crossed herself again.

"Quickly, run and tell your father what has happened. He will find Urszula Wojnak on the estate and you must take them both to the mother, and then be sure they come back to me."

The young hunter handed over the little boy to his mother, happy enough not to have dropped the slippery creature. Now, free of his quarry, he rubbed his hands on his trousers and ran off to look for his father.

The mother closed the door with her shoulder and called out for her eldest child, a girl, to put the pot on the stove. She sat down on a wooden stool, unbuttoned her bodice and pushed a tired nipple toward the little puckered mouth. Sophia, her younger daughter, only six months old, would have to go without her supper tonight. Come to think of it, so would the whole family.

"And to what purpose?" the woman said out loud, tucking a shawl around her arm and the child together. "Poor little mite, you'll be dead by morning."

But she did not repeat these feelings to old Urszula Wojnak when the midwife washed the little body and tended to the twisted umbilical stump late that night. Her husband stood silently by observing the scene.

"A guest in the house is God in the house," declared the woman, quoting the old Polish proverb.

Her husband spat. "To the cholera with him. We have enough children of our own."

The woman pretended not to hear him as she stroked the dark, thin hairs on the baby's head.

"What shall we call him?" the woman asked, looking up at her husband.

He shrugged. "Who cares? Let him go to his grave nameless."

April 18, 1906
Boston, Massachusetts

The doctor picked up the newborn child by the ankles and slapped its bottom. The infant started to cry.

In Boston, Massachusetts, there is a hospital that caters mainly to those who suffer from the diseases of the rich, and on selected occasions allows itself to deliver the new rich. At the Massachusetts General Hospital the mothers don't scream, and certainly they don't give birth fully dressed. It is not the done thing.

A young man was pacing up and down outside the delivery room; inside, two obstetricians and the family doctor were on duty. This father did not believe in taking risks with his first-born. The two obstetricians would be paid a large fee merely to stand by and witness events. One of them who wore evening clothes under his long white coat had a dinner party to attend later, but he could not afford to absent himself from this particular birth. The three had earlier drawn straws to decide who should deliver the child, and Doctor MacKenzie, the family G.P., had won. A sound, secure name, the father considered, as he paced up and down the corridor. Not that he had any reason to be anxious. Roberts had driven the young man's wife, Anne, to the hospital in the hansom carriage that morning, which she had calculated was the twenty-eighth day of her ninth month. She had started labor soon after breakfast, and he had been assured that delivery would not take place until his bank had closed for the day. The father was a disciplined man and saw no reason why a birth should interrupt his well-ordered life. Nevertheless, he continued to pace. Nurses and young doctors hurried past him, aware of his presence, their voices lowered when they were near him and raised again only when they were out of his earshot. He didn't notice, because everybody had always treated him this way. Most of them had never seen him in person, but all of them knew who he was.

If it was a boy, a son, he would probably build the new children's wing that the hospital so badly needed. He had already built a library and a school. The expectant father tried to read the evening paper, looking over the words but not taking in their meaning. He was nervous, even worried. It would never do for them (he looked upon almost everyone as "them") to realize that it had to be a boy, a boy who would one day take his place as president and chairman of the bank. He turned the pages of the Evening Transcript. The Boston Red Sox had tied with the New York Highlanders—others would be celebrating. Then he recalled the headline on the front page and returned to it. The worst earthquake ever in the history of America. Devastation in San Francisco, at least four hundred people dead—others would be mourning. He hated that. It would take away from the birth of his son. People would remember that something else had happened on this day.

It never occurred to him, not even for a moment, that the baby might be a girl. He turned to the financial pages and checked the stock market: it had dropped a few points; that damned earthquake had taken $100,000 off the value of his own holdings in the bank, but as his personal fortune remained comfortably over $16 million, it was going to take more than a California earthquake to move him. He could now live on the interest, so the $16 million capital would always remain intact, ready for his son, still unborn. He continued to pace and pretend to read the Transcript.

The obstetrician in evening dress pushed through the swinging doors of the delivery room to report the news. He felt he must do something for his large unearned fee and he was the most suitably dressed for the announcement. The two men stared at each other for a moment. The doctor also felt a little nervous, but he wasn't going to show it in front of the father.

"Congratulations, sir, you have a son, a fine-looking little boy."

What silly remarks people make when a child is born, the father thought; how could he be anything but little? The news hadn't yet dawned on him—a son. He almost thanked God. The obstetrician ventured a question to break the silence.

"Have you decided what you will name him?"

The father answered without hesitation: "William Lowell Kane."

Long after the excitement of the baby's arrival had passed and the rest of the family had gone to bed, the mother remained awake with the child in her arms. Helena Koskiewicz believed in life, and she had borne six children to prove it. Although she had lost three more in infancy, she had not let any of them go easily.

Now at thirty-five she knew that her once lusty Jasio would give her no more sons or daughters: God had given her this one; surely he was destined to live. Helena's was a simple faith, which was good, for her destiny was never to afford her more than a simple life. She was gray and thin, not through choice but through little food, hard work and no spare money. It never occurred to her to complain, but the lines on her face would have been more in keeping with a grandmother than a mother in today's world. She had never worn new clothes even once in her life.

Helena squeezed her breasts so hard that dull red marks appeared around the nipples. Little drops of milk squirted out. At thirty-five, halfway through life's contract, we all have some useful piece of expertise to pass on, and Helena Koskiewicz's was now at a premium.

"Matka's littlest one," she whispered tenderly to the child, and drew the milky teat across its pursed mouth. The blue eyes opened and tiny drops of sweat broke out on the baby's nose as he tried to suck. Finally the mother slumped unwillingly into a deep sleep.

Jasio Koskiewicz, a heavy, dull man with a full mustache, his only gesture of self-assertion in an otherwise servile existence, discovered his wife and the baby asleep in the rocking chair when he rose at five. He hadn't noticed her absence from their bed that night. He stared down at the bastard who had, thank God, at least stopped wailing. Was it dead? Jasio considered the easiest way out of the dilemma was to get himself to work and not interfere with the intruder; let the woman worry about life and death: his preoccupation was to be on the Baron's estate by first light. He took a few long swallows of goat's milk and wiped his luxuriant mustache on his sleeve. Then he grabbed a hunk of bread with one hand and his traps with the other and slipped noiselessly out of the cottage, for fear of waking the woman and getting himself involved. He strode away toward the forest, giving no more thought to the little intruder other than to assume that he had seen him for the last time.

Florentyna, the elder daughter, was next to enter the kitchen, just before the old clock that for many years had kept its own time, claimed that 6 A.M. had arrived. It was of no more than ancillary assistance to those who wished to know if it was the hour to get up or go to bed. Among Florentyna's daily duties was the preparation of breakfast, in itself a minor task involving the simple division of a skin of goat's milk and a lump of rye bread among a family of eight. Nevertheless, it required the wisdom of Solomon to carry out the task in such a way that no one complained about another's portion.

Florentyna struck those who saw her for the first time as a pretty, frail, shabby little thing. It was unfair that for the last two years she had had only one dress to wear, but those who could separate their opinion of the child from that of her surroundings understood why Jasio had fallen in love with her mother. Florentyna's long fair hair shone and her hazel eyes sparkled in defiance of her birth and diet.

She tiptoed up to the rocking chair and stared down at her mother and the little boy, whom Florentyna had adored at first sight. She had never in her eight years owned a doll. Actually she had seen one only once, when the family had been invited to a celebration of the feast of St. Nicholas at the Baron's castle. Even then she had not actually touched the beautiful object, but now she felt an inexplicable urge to hold this baby in her arms. She bent down and eased the child away from her mother, and staring down into the little blue eyes—such blue eyes—she began to hum. The change of temperature from the warmth of the mother's breast to the cold of the little girl's hands made the baby indignant. He immediately started crying and woke the mother, whose only reaction was of guilt for having fallen asleep.

"Holy God, he's still alive," she said to Florentyna. "You prepare breakfast for the boys while I try to feed him again."

Florentyna reluctantly handed the infant back and watched her mother once again pump her aching breasts. The little girl was mesmerized.

"Hurry up, Florcia," chided her mother. "The rest of the family must eat as well."

Florentyna obeyed, and as her brothers arrived from the loft where they all slept, they kissed their mother's hands in greeting and stared at the newcomer in awe. All they knew was that this one had not come from Matka's stomach. Florentyna was too excited to eat her breakfast this morning, so the boys divided her portion among them without a second thought and left their mother's share on the table. No one noticed, as they went about their daily tasks, that the mother hadn't eaten anything since the baby's arrival.

Helena Koskiewicz was pleased that her children had learned so early in life to fend for themselves. They could feed the animals, milk the goats and cows and tend the vegetable garden without her help or prodding. When Jasio returned home in the evening she suddenly realized that she had not prepared supper for him, but that Florentyna had taken the rabbits from Franck, her brother the hunter, and had already started to cook them. Florentyna was proud to be in charge of the evening meal, a responsibility she was entrusted with only when her mother was unwell, and Helena Koskiewicz rarely allowed herself that luxury. The young hunter had brought home four rabbits, and the father six mushrooms and three potatoes: tonight would be a veritable feast.

After dinner, Jasio Koskiewicz sat in his chair by the fire and studied the child properly for the first time. Holding the little baby under the armpits, with his splayed fingers supporting the helpless head, he cast a trapper's eye over the infant. Wrinkled and toothless, the face was redeemed only by the fine, blue unfocusing eyes. As the man directed his gaze toward the thin body, something immediately attracted his attention. He scowled and rubbed the delicate chest with his thumbs.

"Have you noticed this, Helena?" said the trapper, prodding the baby's ribs. "The ugly little bastard has only one nipple?"

His wife frowned as she in turn rubbed the skin with her thumb, as though the action would supply the missing organ. Her husband was right: the minute and colorless left nipple was there, but where its mirror image should have appeared on the right-hand side, the shallow breast was completely smooth and uniformly pink.

The woman's superstitious tendencies were immediately aroused. "He has been given to me by God," she exclaimed. "See His mark upon him."

The man thrust the child angrily at her. "You're a fool, Helena. The child was given to its mother by a man with bad blood." He spat into the fire, the more precisely to express his opinion of the child's parentage. "Anyway, I wouldn't bet a potato on the little bastard's survival."

Jasio Koskiewicz cared even less than a potato whether or not the child survived. He was not by nature a callous man, but the boy was not his, and one more mouth to feed could only compound his problems. But if it was so to be, it was not for him to question the Almighty, and with no more thought of the boy, he fell into a deep sleep by the fire.

As the days passed by, even Jasio Koskiewicz began to believe that the child might survive and, had he been a betting man, he would have lost a potato. The eldest son, the hunter, with the help of his younger brothers, made the child a cot out of wood that they had collected from the Baron's forest. Florentyna made his clothes by cutting little pieces off her own dresses and then sewing them together. They would have called him Harlequin if they had known what it meant. In truth, naming him caused more disagreement in the household than any other single problem had for months; only the father had no opinion to offer. Finally, they agreed on Wladek; the following Sunday, in the chapel on the Baron's great estate, the child was christened Wladek Koskiewicz, the mother thanking God for sparing his life, the father resigning himself to whatever must be.

That evening there was a small feast to celebrate the christening, augmented by the gift of a goose from the Baron's estate. They all ate heartily.

From that day on, Florentyna learned to divide by nine.

Anne Kane had slept peacefully through the night. When after her breakfast her son William returned in the arms of one of the hospital's nurses, she could not wait to hold him again.

"Now then, Mrs. Kane," the white-uniformed nurse said briskly, "shall we give baby his breakfast too?"

She sat Anne, who was abruptly aware of her swollen breasts, up in bed and guided the two novices through the procedure. Anne, conscious that to appear embarrassed would be considered unmaternal, gazed fixedly into William's blue eyes, bluer even than his father's, and assimilated her new position, with which it would have been illogical to be other than pleased. At twenty-one, she was not conscious that she lacked anything. Born a Cabot, married into a branch of the Lowell family, and now a firstborn son to carry on the tradition summarized so succinctly in the card sent to her by an old school friend:

*And this is good old Boston,
The home of the bean and the cod,
Where the Lowells talk to the Cabots,
And the Cabots talk only to God.*

Anne spent half an hour talking to William but obtained little response. He was then retired for a sleep in the same efficient manner by which he had arrived. Anne nobly resisted the fruit and candy piled by her bedside. She was determined to get back into all her dresses by the summer season and reassume her rightful place in the fashionable magazines. Had not the Prince de Garonne said that she was the only beautiful object in Boston? Her long golden hair, fine delicate features and slim figure had excited admiration in cities she had never even visited. She checked in the mirror: no telltale lines on her face; people would hardly believe that she was the mother of a bouncing boy. Thank God it is a bouncing boy, thought Anne.

She enjoyed a light lunch and prepared herself for the visitors who would appear during the afternoon, already screened by her private secretary. Those who would be allowed to see her on the first days had to be family or from the very best families; others would be told she was not yet ready to receive them. But as Boston was the last city remaining in America where each knew his place to the finest degree of social prominence, there was unlikely to be any unexpected intruder.

The room that she alone occupied could easily have taken another five beds had it not already been cluttered with flowers. A casual passerby could have been forgiven for mistaking it for a minor horticultural show, had it not been for the presence of the young mother sitting upright in bed. Anne switched on the electric light, still a novelty for her; Richard and she had waited for the Cabots to have them fitted, which all of Boston had interpreted as an oracular sign that electromagnetic induction was from then on socially acceptable.

The first visitor was Anne's mother-in-law, Mrs. Thomas Lowell Kane, the head of the family since her husband had died the previous year. In elegant late middle-age, she had perfected the technique of sweeping into a room to her own total satisfaction and to its occupants' undoubted discomfort. She wore a long chemise dress, which made it impossible to view her ankles; the only man who had ever seen her ankles was now dead. She had always been lean. In her opinion, fat women meant bad food and even worse breeding. She was now the oldest Lowell alive, the oldest Kane, come to that. She therefore expected and was expected to be the first to arrive. After all, had it not been she who had arranged the meeting between Anne and Richard? Love had seemed of little consequence to Mrs. Kane. Wealth, position and prestige she could always come to terms with. Love was all very well, but it rarely proved to be a lasting commodity; the other three were. She kissed her daughter-in-law approvingly on the forehead. Anne touched a button on the wall, and a quiet buzz could be heard. The noise took Mrs. Kane by surprise; she had not believed that electricity would ever catch on. The nurse reappeared with the heir. Mrs. Kane inspected him, sniffed her satisfaction and waved him away.

"Well done, Anne," the old lady said, as if her daughter-in-law had won a minor equestrian prize. "All of us are very proud of you."

Anne's own mother, Mrs. Edward Cabot, arrived a few minutes later. She, like Mrs. Kane, had been widowed at an early age and differed so little from her in appearance that those who observed them only from afar tended to get them muddled up. But to do her justice, she took considerably more interest than Mrs. Kane in her new grandson and in her daughter. The inspection continued to the flowers.

"How kind of the Jacksons to remember," murmured Cabot.

Mrs. Kane adopted a more cursory procedure. Her eyes skimmed over the delicate blooms, then settled on the donors' cards. She whispered the soothing names to herself: Adamses, Lawrences, Lodges, Higginsons. Neither grandmother commented on the names they didn't know; they were both past the age of wanting to learn of anything or anyone new. They left together, well pleased: an heir had been born and appeared, on first sight, to be adequate. They both considered that their final family obligation had been successfully, albeit vicariously, performed and that they themselves might now progress to the role of chorus.

They were both wrong.

Anne and Richard's close friends poured in during the afternoon with gifts and good wishes, the former of gold or silver, the latter in high-pitched Brahmin accents.

When her husband arrived after the close of business, Anne was somewhat overtired. Richard had drunk champagne at lunch for the first time in his life—old Amos Kerbes had insisted and, with the whole Somerset Club looking on, Richard could hardly have refused. He seemed to his wife to be a little less stiff than usual. Solid in his long black frock coat and pinstripe trousers, he stood fully six feet one, his dark hair with its center parting gleaming in the light of the large electric bulb. Few would have guessed his age correctly as only thirty-three: youth had never been important to him; substance was the only thing that mattered. Once again William Lowell Kane was called for and inspected, as if the father were checking the balance at the end of the book-keeping day. All seemed to be in order. The boy had two less arms, ten fingers, ten toes, and Richard could see nothing that might later embarrass him, so William was sent away.

"I wired the headmaster of St. Paul's last night. William has been admitted for September 1918."

Anne said nothing, Richard had so obviously started planning William's career.

"Well, my dear, are you fully recovered today?" he went on to inquire, having never spent a day in the hospital during his thirty-three years.

"Yes—no—I think so," his wife responded timidly, suppressing a rising tearfulness that she knew would only displease her husband. The answer was not of the sort that Richard could hope to understand. He kissed his wife on the cheek and returned in the hansom carriage to the Red House on Louisburg Square, their family home. With staff, servants, the new baby and his nurse, there would now be nine mouths to feed. Richard did not give the matter a second thought.

William Lowell Kane received the church's blessing and the names his father had chosen before birth at the Protestant Episcopal Cathedral of St. Paul's, in the presence of everybody in Boston who mattered and a few who didn't. Bishop William Lawrence officiated; J. P. Morgan and Alan Lloyd, bankers of impeccable standing, along with Milly Preston, Anne's closest friend, were the chosen godparents. His Grace sprinkled the holy water on William's head; the boy didn't murmur. He was already learning the Brahmin approach to life. Anne thanked God for the safe birth of her son, and Richard thanked God, Whom he regarded as an external bookkeeper whose function was to record the deeds of the Kane family from generation to generation, that he had a son to whom he could leave his fortune. Still, he thought, perhaps he had better be certain and have a second boy. From his kneeling position he glanced sideways at his wife, well pleased with her.

Wladek Koskiewicz grew slowly. It became apparent to his foster mother that the boy's health would always be a problem. He caught all the illnesses and diseases that growing children normally catch and many that others don't, and he passed them on indiscriminately to the rest of the Koskiewicz family. Helena treated him as any of her own brood and always vigorously defended him when Jasio began to blame the devil rather than God for Wladek's presence in their tiny cottage. Florentyna, on the other hand, took care of Wladek as if he were her own child. She loved him from the first moment she had set eyes on him with an intensity that grew from a fear that because no one would ever want to marry her, the penniless daughter of a trapper, she must therefore be childless. Wladek was her child.

The eldest brother, the hunter, who had found Wladek, treated him like a plaything but was too afraid of his father to admit that he liked the frail infant who was growing into a sturdy toddler. In any case, next January the hunter was to leave school and start work on the Baron's estate, and children were a woman's problem, so his father had told him. The three younger brothers, Stefan, Josef and Jan, showed little interest in Wladek, and the remaining member of the family, Sophia, was happy enough just to cuddle him.

What neither parent had been prepared for was a character and mind so different from those of their own children. No one could miss the physical or intellectual difference. The Koskiewiczes were all tall, large-boned, with fair hair and except for Florentyna, gray eyes. Wladek was short and round, with dark hair and intensely blue eyes. The Koskiewiczes had minimal pretensions to scholarship and soon moved from the village school as soon as allowed. Wladek, on the other hand walking, spoke at eighteen months. Read at three but was still unable to dress himself. Wrote at five but continued to wet his bed. He became the despair of his father and the pride of his mother. His first four years on this earth were memorable only as a continual physical attempt through illness to try to depart from it, and for the sustained efforts of Helena and Florentyna to ensure that he did not succeed. He ran around the little wooden cottage barefoot, usually dressed in his harlequin outfit, a yard or so behind his mother. When Florentyna returned from school, he would transfer his allegiance, never leaving her side until she put him to bed. In her division of the food by nine, Florentyna often sacrificed half of her own share to Wladek, or if he was ill, the entire portion. Wladek wore the clothes she made for him, sang the songs she taught him and shared with her the few toys and presents she had been given.

Because Florentyna was away at school most of the day, Wladek wanted from a young age to go with her. As soon as he was allowed to (holding firmly on to Florentyna's hand until they reached the village school) he walked the eighteen wiorsta, some nine miles, through the woods of moss-covered birches and cypresses and the orchards of lime and cherry to Slonim to begin his education.

Wladek liked school from the first day; it was an escape from the tiny cottage that had until then been his whole world. School also confronted him for the first time in life with the savage implications of the Russian occupation of eastern Poland. He learned that his native Polish was to be spoken only in the privacy of the cottage and that while at school, only Russian was to be used. He sensed in the other children around him a fierce pride in the oppressed mother tongue and culture. He, too, felt that same pride. To his surprise, Wladek found that he was not belittled by Mr. Kotowski, his schoolteacher, the way he was at home by his father. Although still the youngest, as at home, it was not long before he rose above all his classmates in everything other than height. His tiny stature misled them into continual underestimation of his real abilities: children always imagine biggest is best. By the age of five Wladek was first in every subject taken by his class.

At night, back at the little wooden cottage, while the other children would tend the violets and poplars that bloomed so fragrantly in their springtime garden, pick berries, chop wood, catch rabbits or make dresses, Wladek read and read, until he was reading the unopened books of his eldest brother and then those of his elder sister. It began to dawn slowly on Helena Koskiewicz that she had taken on more than she had bargained for when the young hunter had brought home the little animal in place of three rabbits; already Wladek was asking questions she could not answer. She knew soon that she would be quite unable to cope and she wasn't sure what to do about it. She had an unswerving belief in destiny and so was not surprised when the decision was taken out of her hands.

One evening in the autumn of 1911 came the first turning point in Wladek's life. The family had all finished their plain supper of beetroot soup and meatballs, Jasio Koskiewicz was snoring by the fire, Helena was sewing and the other children were playing. Wladek was sitting at the feet of his mother, reading, when above the noise of Stefan and Josef squabbling over the possession of some newly painted pine cones, they heard a loud knock on the door. They all went silent. A knock was always a surprise to the Koskiewicz family, for at the little cottage, eighteen wiorsta from Slonim village and over six from the Baron's estate, visitors were almost unknown and could be offered only a drink of berry juice and the company of noisy children. The whole family looked toward the door apprehensively. As if it had not happened, they waited for the knock to come again. It did—if anything, a little louder. Jasio rose sleepily from his chair, walked to the door and opened it cautiously. When they saw the man standing there, they all bowed their heads except Wladek, who stared up at the broad, handsome, aristocratic figure in the heavy bearskin coat, whose presence dominated the tiny room and brought fear into the father's eyes. A cordial smile allayed that fear, and the trapper invited the Baron Rosnovski into his home. Nobody spoke. The Baron had never visited there in the past and no one was sure of what to say.

Wladek put down his book, rose and walked toward the stranger, thrusting out his hand before his father could see him.

"Good evening, sir," said Wladek.

The Baron took his hand and they stared into each other's eyes. As the Baron released him, Wladek's eyes fell on the magnificent silver band around his wrist with an inscription on it that he could not quite make out.

"You must be Wladek."

"Yes, sir," said the boy, neither sounding nor showing surprise that the Baron knew his name.

"It is you about whom I have come to see your father," said the Baron.

Wladek remained before the Baron, staring up at him. The trapper signified to his own children by a wave of his arm that they should leave him alone with his master, so two of them curtsied, four bowed and all six retreated silently into the loft. Wladek remained, and no one suggested he should do otherwise.

"Koskiewicz," began the Baron, still standing, as no one had invited him to sit. The trapper had not offered him a chair for two reasons: first, because he was too shy, and second, because he assumed the Baron was there to issue a reprimand. "I have come to ask a favor."

"Anything, sir, anything," said the father, wondering what he could give the Baron that he did not already have hundredfold.

The Baron continued. "My son, Leon, is now six and is being taught privately at the castle by two tutors, one from our native Poland and the other from Germany. They tell me he is a clever boy but lacks competition: he has only himself to beat. Mr. Kotowski at the village school tells me that Wladek is the only boy capable of providing the competition that Leon so badly needs. I wonder therefore if you would allow your son to leave the village school and join Leon and his tutors at the castle."

Wladek continued to stand before the Baron, gazing, while before him there opened a wondrous vision of food and drink, books and teachers wiser by far than Mr. Kotowski. He glanced toward his mother. She, too, was gazing at the Baron, her face filled with wonder and sorrow. His father turned to his mother and the instant of silent communication between them seemed an eternity to the child.

The trapper gruffly addressed the Baron's feet. "We would be honored, sir."

The Baron looked interrogatively at Helena Koskiewicz.

"The Blessed Virgin forbids that I should ever stand in my child's way," she said softly, "though she alone knows how much it will cost me."

"But Madam Koskiewicz, your son can return home regularly to see you."

"Yes, sir. I expect he will do so, at first." She was about to add some plea but decided against it.

an admiration at the gray uniforms of the soldiers in the town who guarded the nearby Russian-Polish border, but they had never seen anything so resplendent as this liveried servant, towering above them and evidently of overwhelming importance. There was a thick carpet in the hall, and Wladek stared at the green and red pattern, amazed by its beauty, wondering if he should take his shoes off and surprised, when he walked across it, that his footsteps made no sound. The dazzling being conducted them to their bedrooms in the west wing. Separate bedrooms—would they ever get to sleep? At least there was a connecting door, so they need never be too far apart, and in fact for many nights they slept together in one bed.

When they had both unpacked, Florentyna was taken to the kitchen, and Wladek to a playroom in the south wing of the castle to meet the Baron's son. Leon was a tall, good-looking boy who was so immediately charming and welcoming that Wladek abandoned his prepared pugnacious posture with surprise and relief. Leon had been a lonely child, with no one to play with except his niania, the devoted Lithuanian woman who had breast-fed him and attended to his every need since the premature death of his mother. The stocky boy who had come out of the forest promised companionship. At least in one matter they both knew they had been deemed equals.

Leon immediately offered to show Wladek around the castle, and the tour took the rest of the morning. Wladek remained astounded by its size, the richness of the furniture and fabrics and those carpets in every room. To Leon he admitted only to being agreeably impressed: after all, he had won his place in the castle on merit. The main part of the building was early Gothic, explained the Baron's son, as if Wladek were sure to know what Gothic meant. Wladek nodded. Next Leon took his new friend down into the immense cellars, with line upon line of wine bottles covered in dust and cobwebs. Wladek's favorite room was the vast dining hall, with its massive pillared vaulting and flagged floor. There were animals' heads all around the walls. Leon told him they were bison, bear, elk, boar and wolverine. At the end of the room, resplendent, was the Baron's coat of arms below a stag's antlers. The Rosnovski family motto read: "Fortune favors the brave." After a lunch, which Wladek ate so little of because he couldn't master a knife and fork, he met his two tutors, who did not give him the same warm welcome, and in the evening he climbed up onto the longest bed he had ever seen and told Florentyna about his adventures. Her excited eyes never once left his face, nor did she even close her mouth, agape with wonder; especially when she heard about the knife and fork.

The tutoring started at seven sharp, before breakfast, and continued throughout the day with only short breaks for meals. Initially, Leon was clearly ahead of Wladek, but Wladek wrestled determinedly with his books so that as the weeks passed, the gap began to narrow, while friendship and rivalry between the two boys developed simultaneously. The German and Polish tutors found it hard to treat their two pupils, the son of a baron and the son of a trapper, as equals, although they reluctantly conceded to the Baron when he inquired that Mr. Kotowski had made the right academic choice. The tutors' attitude toward Wladek never worried him, because he was always treated as an equal by Leon.

The Baron let it be known that he was pleased with the progress the two boys were making and from time to time he would reward Wladek with clothes and toys. Wladek's initial distant and detached admiration for the Baron developed into respect, and when the time came for the boy to return to the little cottage in the forest to rejoin his father and mother for Christmas, Wladek became distressed at the thought of leaving Leon.

His distress was well founded. Despite the initial happiness he felt at seeing his mother, the short space of three months that he had spent in the Baron's castle had revealed to him deficiencies in his own home of which he had previously been quite unaware. The holiday dragged on. Wladek felt himself stifled by the little cottage with its one room and loft, and dissatisfied by the food dished out in such meager amounts and then eaten by hand: no one had divided by nine at the castle. After two weeks Wladek longed to return to Leon and the Baron. Every afternoon he would walk the six wiorsta to the castle and sit and stare at the great walls that surrounded the estate. Florentyna, who had lived only among the kitchen servants, took to returning more easily and could not understand that the cottage would never be home again for Wladek. The trapper was not sure how to treat the boy, who was now well dressed, well-spoken and talked of things at six that the man did not begin to understand; nor did he want to. The boy seemed to do nothing but waste the entire day reading. Whatever would become of him. the trapper wondered, if he could not swing an axe or trap a hare; how could he ever hope to earn an honest living? He too prayed that the holiday would pass quickly.

Helena was proud of Wladek and at first avoided admitting to herself that a wedge had been driven between him and the rest of the children. But in the end it could not be avoided. Playing at soldiers one evening, both Stefan and Franck, generals on opposing sides, refused to have Wladek in their armies.

"Why must I always be left out?" cried Wladek. "I want to learn to fight too."

"Because you are not one of us," declared Stefan. "You are not really our brother."

There was a long silence before Franck continued. "Ojciec never wanted you in the first place; only Matka was on your side."

Wladek stood motionless and cast his eye around the circle of children, searching for Florentyna.

"What does Franck mean, I am not your brother?" he demanded.

Thus Wladek came to hear of the manner of his birth and to understand why he had always been set apart from his brothers and sisters. Though his mother's distress at his now total self-containment became oppressive, Wladek was secretly pleased to discover that, untouched by the meanness of the trapper's blood, he came of unknown stock, containing with it the germ of spirit that would now make all things seem possible.

When the unhappy holiday eventually came to an end, Wladek returned to the castle with joy. Leon welcomed him back with open arms; for him, as isolated by the wealth of his father as was Wladek by the poverty of the trapper, it had also been a Christmas with little to celebrate. From then on the two boys grew very close and soon became inseparable. When the summer holidays came around, Leon begged his father to allow Wladek to remain at the castle. The Baron agreed, for he too had grown to respect Wladek. Wladek was overjoyed and entered the trapper's cottage only once again in his life.

When Wladek and Leon had finished their classroom work, they would spend the remaining hours playing games. Their favorite was chow anego, a sort of hide-and-seek, and because the castle had seventy-two rooms, the chance of repetition was very small. Wladek's favorite hiding place was in the dungeons under the castle, in which the only light by which one could be discovered came through a small stone grille set high in the wall, and even here one needed a candle to find one's way around. Wladek was not sure what purpose the dungeons served, and none of the servants ever made mention of them, since they had never been used in anyone's memory.

Wladek was conscious that he was Leon's equal only in the classroom and was no competition for his friend when they played any game other than chess. The river Shchara, which bordered the estate, became an extension to their playground. In spring they fished, in summer they swam, and in winter, when the river was frozen over, they would put on their wooden skates and chase each other across the ice, while Florentyna sat on the river bank anxiously warning them where the surface was thin. But Wladek never heeded her and was always the one who fell in. Leon grew quickly and strong; he ran well, swam well and never seemed to tire or be ill. Wladek became aware for the first time what good-looking and well built meant, and he knew when he swam, ran and skated he could never hope to keep up with Leon. Much worse, what Leon called the belly button was, on him, almost unnoticeable, while Wladek's was stumpy and ugly and protruded from the middle of his plump body. Wladek would spend long hours in the quiet of his own room, studying his physique in a mirror, always asking why, and in particular why only one nipple for him when all the boys he had ever seen bare-chested had the two that the symmetry of the human body appeared to require. Sometimes as he lay in bed unable to sleep, he would finger his naked chest and tears of self-pity would flood onto the pillow. He would finally fall asleep praying that when he awoke in the morning, things would be different. His prayers were not answered.

Wladek put aside a time each night to do physical exercises that could not be witnessed by anyone, even Florentyna. Through sheer determination he learned to hold himself so that he looked taller. He built up his arms and his legs and hung by the tips of his fingers from a beam in the bedroom in the hope that it would make him grow, but Leon grew taller even while he slept. Wladek was forced to accept the fact that he would always be a head shorter than the Baron's son, and that nothing, nothing was ever going to produce the missing nipple. Wladek's dislike of his own body was not prompted by Leon, who never commented on his friend's appearance; his knowledge of other children stopped short at Wladek, whom he adored uncritically.

Baron Rosnovski too became increasingly fond of the fierce dark-haired boy who had replaced the younger brother Leon had so tragically lost when the Baroness died in childbirth.

The two boys would dine with him in the great stone-walled hall each evening while the flickering candles cast ominous shadows from the stuffed animal heads on the walls, and the servants came and went noiselessly with great silver trays and golden plates, bearing geese, hams, crayfish, fine wine and fruits, and sometimes the mazureks, which had become Wladek's particular favorites. Afterward, as the darkness fell ever more thickly around the table, the Baron dismissed the waiting servants and would tell the boys stories of Polish history and allowed them a sip of Danzig vodka, in which the tiny gold leaves sparkled bravely in the candlelight. Wladek begged as often as he dared for the story of Tadeusz Kosciuszko.

"A great patriot and hero," the Baron would reply. "The very symbol of our struggle for independence, trained in France..."

"Whose people we admire and love as we have learned to hate all Russians and Austrians," supplied Wladek, whose pleasure in the tale was enhanced by his word-perfect knowledge of it.

"Who is telling whom the story, Wladek?" The Baron laughed. "...and then fought with George Washington in America for liberty and democracy. In 1792 he led the Poles in battle at Dubienka. When our wretched king, Stanislaw Augustus, deserted us to join the Russians, Kosciuszko returned to the homeland he loved, to throw off the yoke of tsardom. He won the battle of where, Leon?"

"Raclawice, sir, and then he freed Warsaw."

"Good, my child. Then, alas, the Russians mustered a great force at Maciejowice and he was finally defeated and taken prisoner. My great-great-great-grandfather fought with Kosciuszko on that day and later with Dabrowski's legions for the mighty Napoleon Bonaparte."

"And for his service to Poland was created the Baron Rosnovski, a title your family will ever bear in remembrance of those great days," said Wladek as stoutly as if the title would one day pass to him.

"Yes, and those great days will come again," said the Baron quietly. "I only pray that I may live to see them."

That Christmas some of the peasants on the estate brought their families to the castle for the celebration of the blessed vigil. Throughout Christmas Eve they fasted, and the children would look out of the windows for the first star, which was the sign the feast might begin. The Baron would say grace in his fine, deep voice: "Benedicte nobis, Domine Deus, et his donis quae ex liberalitate tua sumpturi sumus," and once they had sat down Wladek would be embarrassed by the huge capacity of Jasio Koskiewicz, who addressed himself squarely to every one of the thirteen courses, from the barszcz soup through to the cakes and plums, and would, as in previous years, be sick in the forest on the way home.

After the feast Wladek enjoyed distributing the gifts from the Christmas tree, laden with candles and fruit, to the awe-struck peasant children—a doll for Sophia, a forest knife for Josef, a new dress for Florentyna—the first gift Wladek had ever requested of the Baron.

"It's true," said Josef to his mother when he received his gift from Wladek, "he is not our brother, Matka."

"No," she replied, "but he will always be my son."

Through the winter and spring of 1914 Wladek grew in strength and learning; then suddenly, in July, the German tutor left the castle without even saying farewell; neither boy was sure why. They never thought to connect his departure with the assassination in Sarajevo of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand by a student anarchist, the event described to them by their remaining tutor in unaccountably solemn tones. The Baron became withdrawn; neither boy was sure why. The younger servants, the children's favorites, inevitably began to disappear one by one; neither boy was sure why. As the year passed Leon grew taller, Wladek grew stronger and both boys became wiser.

One morning in August 1915, a time of fine, lazy days, the Baron set off on the long journey to Warsaw to put, as he described it, his affairs in order. He was away for three and a half weeks, twenty-five days that Wladek marked off each morning on a calendar in his bedroom; it seemed to him a lifetime. On the day the Baron was due to return, the two boys went down to the Slonim railway station to await the weekly train with its one carriage and greet the Baron his arrival. The three of them traveled home in silence.

Wladek thought the great man looked tired and older another unaccountable circumstance, and during the following week the Baron often conducted with the chief servant
a rapid and anxious dialogue, broken off whenever Leon o-Wladek entered the room, an uncharacteristic surreptitiousness that made the two boys uneasy and fearful that they were the unwitting cause of it. Wladek despaired that the Baron might send him back to the trapper's cottage—always aware he was a stranger in a stranger's home.

One evening a few days after the Baron had returned he called for the two boys to join him in the great hall. They crept in, fearful of him. Without explanation he told them that they were about to make a long journey. The little conversation, insubstantial as it seemed to Wladek at the time, remained with him for the rest of his life.

"My dear children," began the Baron in a low, faltering tone, "the warmongers of Germany and the Austro-Hungarian empire are at the throat of Warsaw and will soon be upon us."

Wladek recalled an inexplicable phrase flung out by the Polish tutor at the German tutor during their last tense days together. "Does that mean that the hour of the submerged peoples of Europe is at last upon us?" he asked.

The Baron regarded Wladek's innocent face tenderly. "Our national spirit has not perished in one hundred and fifty years of attrition and repression," he replied. "It may be that that fate of Poland is as much at stake as that of Serbia, but we are powerless to influence history. We are at the mercy of the three mighty empires that surround us."
"We are strong, we can fight," said Leon. "We have wooden swords and shields. We are not afraid of Germans or Russians."

"My son, you have only played at war. This battle will not be between children. We must now find a small, quiet place to live until history has decided our fate, and we must leave as soon as possible. I can only pray that this is not the end of your childhood."

Leon and Wladek were both mystified and irritated by the Baron's words. War sounded like an exciting adventure, which they would be sure to miss if they left the castle. The servants took several days to pack the Baron's possessions, and Wladek and Leon were informed that they would be Assizes and the trial lasted fourteen days. Each prisoner was defended by a famous lawyer. Brioulet would never take back a single word. And the result was that for a piddling twenty thousand francs and a damn-fool crack the biggest crook in France got fifteen years hard labour. There he was, ten years older than his age, and completely ruined. And this was the man I had just signed a treaty with – a life and death pact.

Maitre Raymond Hubert came to see me. He wasn't very pleased with himself. I never uttered a word of blame.

One, two, three, four, five, about turn . . . One, two, three, four, five, about-turn. It was a good many hours now that I had been walking up and down between the door and the window of my cell. I smoked: I felt I was well in control, steady-handed and able to cope with anything at all. I promised myself not to think about revenge for the time being. Let's leave the prosecuting counsel just there where I left him, chained to the rings in the wall, opposite me, without yet making up my mind exactly how I'd do him in.

Suddenly a shriek, a desperate, high-pitched, hideously dying shriek made its way through the door of my cell. What was it? It was like the sound of a man under torture. But this was not the Police Judiciaire. No way of telling what was going on. They turned me right up, those shrieks in the night. And what strength they must have had, to pierce through that padded door. Maybe it was a lunatic. It's so easy to go mad in these cells where nothing ever gets through to you. I talked aloud there all by myself: I said to myself what the hell's it got to do with you? Keep your mind on yourself, nothing but yourself and your new side-kick Dega. I bent down, straightened up and hit myself hard on the chest. It really hurt: so everything was all right – the muscles of my arms were working perfectly. And what about your legs, man? You can congratulate them, because you've been walking more than sixteen hours now and you're not even beginning to feel tired.

The Chinese discovered the drop of water that falls on your head. The French discovered silence. They do away with everything that might occupy your mind. No books, no paper, no pencil: the heavily-barred window entirely boarded up: only a very little light filtering through a few small holes.

That piercing shriek had really shaken me, and I went up and down like an animal in a cage. I had the dreadful feeling that I had been left there, abandoned by everybody, and that I was literally buried alive. I was alone, absolutely alone: the only thing that could ever get through to me was a shriek.

The door opened. An old priest appeared. Suddenly you're not alone: there's a priest there, standing in front of you.

'Good evening, my son. Forgive me for not having come before, but I was on holiday. How are you?' And the good old curé walked calmly into the cell and sat right down on my pad. 'Where do you come from?'

'The Ardèche.'

'And your people?'

'Mum died when I was eleven. Dad was very good to me.'

'What did he do?'

'School-teacher.'

'Is he alive?'

'Yes.'

'Why do you speak of him in the past if he is still alive?'

'Because although he's alive all right, I'm dead.'

'Oh, don't say that! What did you do?'

In a flash I thought how square it would sound to say I was innocent: I replied, 'The police say I killed a man; and if they say it, it must be true.'

'Was it a tradesman?'

'No. A ponce.'

'And they've sentenced you to hard labour for life for something that happened in the underworld? I don't understand. Was it murder?'

'No. Manslaughter.'

'My poor boy, it's unbelievable. What can I do for you? Would you like to pray with me?'

'I never had any religious instruction. I don't know how to pray.'

'That doesn't matter, my son: I'll pray for you. God loves all His children, whether they are christened or not. Repeat each word as I say it, won't you?' His eyes were so gentle, and such kindness beamed from his round face that I was ashamed to refuse; and as he had gone down on his knees I did the same. 'Our Father which art in heaven...' Tears came into my eyes: the dear priest saw them and with his plump finger he gathered a big drop as it ran down my cheek. He put it to his mouth and drank it. 'My son,' he said, 'these tears are the greatest reward God could ever have sent me today, and it comes to me through you. Thank you.' And as he got up he kissed me on the forehead.

We sat there, side by side on the bed again. 'How long is it since you wept?'

'Fourteen years.'

'Why fourteen years ago?'

'It was the day Mum died.'

He took my hand in his and said, 'Forgive those who have made you suffer so.'

I snatched it away and sprang into the middle of my cell – an instinctive reaction. 'Not on your life! I'll never forgive them. And I'll tell you something, Father. There's not a day, not a night, not an hour or minute when I'm not busy working out how I'll kill the guys that sent me here – how, when and what with.'

'You say that, my son, and you believe it. You're young, very young. As you grow older you'll give up the thought of punishment and revenge.' Thirty-four years have passed now, and I am of his opinion. 'What can I do for you?' asked the priest again.

'A crime, Father.'

'What crime?'

'Going to cell 37 and telling Dega to get his lawyer to ask for him to be sent to the central prison at Caen – tell him I've done the same today. We have to get out of the Conciergerie quick and leave for one of the centrals where they make up the Guiana convoys. Because if you miss the first boat you have to wait another two years in solitary before there's another. And when you've seen him, Father, will you come back here?'

'What reason could I give?'

'You could say that you forgot your breviary. I'll be waiting for the answer.'

'And why are you in such a hurry to go off to such a hideous place as the penal settlement?'

I looked at him hard, this great-hearted salesman of the good word, and I was certain he would not betray me. 'So as to escape all the sooner, Father.'

'God will help you, my boy, I am sure of it; and I feel that you will remake your life. I can see in your eyes that you are a decent fellow and that your heart is in the right place. I'll go to cell 37 for you. You can expect an answer.'

He was back very soon. Dega agreed. The curé left me his breviary until the next day.

What a ray of sunlight that was! Thanks to that dear good man my cell was filled with it – all lit up. If God exists why does He allow such different sorts of human being on earth? Creatures like the prosecuting counsel, the police, Polein – and then this chaplain, the chaplain of the Conciergerie?

That truly good man's visit set me up, healed me: and it was useful, too. Our requests went through quickly and a week later there we were, seven of us lined up in the corridor of the Conciergerie at four in the morning. All the screws were there too, a full parade.

'Strip!' Everybody slowly took off his clothes. It was cold and I had goose-pimples.

'Leave your things in front of you. About turn. One pace backwards.' And there in front of each of us was a heap of clothes.

'Dress yourselves.' The good linen shirt I had been wearing a few moments earlier was replaced by a rough undyed canvas job and my lovely suit by a coarse jacket and trousers. No more shoes: instead of them I put my feet into a pair of wooden sabots. Up until then I'd looked like any other ordinary type. I glanced at the other six – Jesus, what a shock! No individuality left at all: they had turned us into convicts in two minutes.

'By the right, dress. Forward march!' With an escort of twenty warders we reached the courtyard and there, one after another, each man was shoved into a narrow cupboard in the cellular van. All aboard for Beaulieu – Beaulieu being the name of the prison at Caen.

Caen Prison

The moment we got there we were taken into the governor's office. He was sitting in pomp behind an Empire desk on a dais some three feet high.

'Shun! The governor is going to speak to you.'

'Prisoners, you are here in transit until you can be sent off to the penal settlement. This is not an ordinary prison. Compulsory silence all the time: no visits: no letters from anyone. You obey or you are broken. There are two doors you can go out by. One leads to the penal settlement, if you behave well. The other to the graveyard. And just let me tell you about bad behaviour: the slightest error will get you sixty days in the punishment-cell on bread and water. No one has yet survived two consecutive sentences to the black-hole. You get my meaning?' He turned to Pierrot le Fou, who had been extradited from Spain. 'What was your calling in civil life?'

'Bullfighter, Monsieur le Directeur.'

The reply infuriated the governor and he bawled out 'Take him away! Double-quick time!' Before you could blink, the bullfighter had been knocked down, clubbed by four or five screws and hurried away from us. He could be heard shouting 'You bastards - five against one. With clubs too, you cowardly shits!' Then an ah like an animal given its death-wound: and nothing more. Only the sound of something being dragged along the concrete floor.

If we did not get the governor's meaning after that performance we should never get it at all. Dega was next to me. He moved one finger, just one, and touched my trousers. I understood his signal: 'Look out for yourself if you want to reach Guiana alive.' Ten minutes later each one of us was in a cell in the punishment block - each one of us except for Pierrot le Fou, who had been taken down below ground-level to a vile black-hole.

As luck would have it Dega was in the next cell to mine. Before this we had been shown to a kind of red-headed, one-eyed ogre, well over six feet tall, with a brand-new bull's pizzle in his right hand. This was the provost, a prisoner who acted as torturer under the orders of the screws. He was the terror of the convicts. With him at hand the warders could beat and flog the prisoners not only without tiring themselves out but also without getting blamed by the authorities in case anyone died of it.

Later, when I was doing a short spell in the hospital, I learnt the story of this human brute. The governor really ought to have been congratulated on choosing his executioner so well. This guy was a quarryman by trade. He lived in a little town up in Flanders, and one day he made up his mind to do away with himself and to kill his wife at the same time. He used a fair-sized stick of dynamite for the job. He lay down next to his wife, who was in their bedroom on the second floor of a six-storey building. She was asleep. He lit a cigarette and used it to light the fuse, holding the stick in his left hand between his own head and his wife's. God-almighty bang. Result: wife had to be scooped up with a spoon – she was literally mince-meat. Part of the house collapsed, killing three children and a seventy-year-old woman. And everybody else in it more or less dangerously hurt. As for this Tribouillard, the guy in question, he lost some of his left hand (only his little finger and half his thumb remaining) and his left eye and ear. His head was bashed badly enough to need trepanning. After his conviction they made him provost in the punishment block of the central prison. This half-maniac had complete power over the wretched prisoners who landed up there.

One, two, three, four, five, about turn ... one, two, three, four, five, about turn ... the unending to-and-fro between the door of the cell and the wall had begun.

You were not allowed to lie down during the daytime. At five in the morning everyone was woken by a piercing blast on a whistle. You had to get up, make your bed, wash, and then either walk about or sit on a stool clamped to the wall. You were not allowed to lie down all day long. And to put the last touch to the penal system the bed was made to fold up against the wall and hook there. That way the prisoner was unable to stretch himself out and he could be watched all the easier.

One, two, three, four, five ... fourteen hours of pacing. To get into the way of this unceasing, mechanical rhythm you have to learn to keep your head down, your hands behind your back, and to walk neither too fast nor too slow, paces all the same length, turning automatically at each end of the cell, left foot one end, right the other.

One, two, three, four, five ... The cells were better lit than at the Conciergerie and noises from outside could be heard – some noises from the punishment block and some that reached us from the countryside. At night you could make out the whistling or the singing as the farm-workers went home, happy after their cider.

I had my Christmas present. There was a crack in the planks blocking the window and through it I saw the snowy fields and a few tall black trees with the full moon lighting them up. Anyone would have said it was one of those cards you send at Christmas. The trees had been shaken by the wind and they had got rid of their covering of snow, so you could distinguish them quite clearly. They stood out as great dark patches against all the rest.

It was Christmas for everybody: it was even Christmas in one part of the prison. The authorities had made an effort for the convicts in transit – we were allowed to buy two bars of chocolate. I really mean two bars and not two slabs. My 1931 Christmas dinner consisted of these two bits of Aiguebelle chocolate.

One, two, three, four, five ... The Law's repression had turned me into a pendulum: my whole world was this going to and fro in a cell. It had been scientifically worked out. Nothing, absolutely nothing, was allowed to remain in the cell. Above all the prisoner must never be allowed to turn his mind to other things. If I were caught looking through that crack in the window planks I should be severely punished. And after all, weren't they right, since as far as they were concerned I was merely a living corpse? What right had I to delight in the landscape?

There was a butterfly, a pale blue butterfly with a little black stripe, flying close to the window, and a bee humming not far from the butterfly. What on earth were they looking for in this place? They seemed to have gone out of their wits at the sight of the winter sun: unless maybe they were cold and wanted to get into the prison. A butterfly in winter is something that has come to life again. How come it wasn't dead? And how come that bee had left its hive? What a nerve – if only they had known it – to come here! Fortunately the provost had no wings, or they wouldn't be alive for long.

This Tribouillard was a bleeding sadist and I had a strong feeling there would be trouble with him. I wasn't wrong either, more's the pity. The day after those lovely insects came to see me I reported sick. I couldn't bear it any more – the loneliness was smothering me and I had to see a face and hear a voice, even an unpleasant one. For it would still be a voice; and something I just had to hear.

Stark naked in the icy corridor I stood there facing the wall, my nose three inches from it: I was the last but one in a line of eight, and I was waiting my turn to go in front of the doctor. I had wanted to see people: and I succeeded all right! The provost caught us just as I was whispering a few words to Julot, the one they called the hammer-man. The red-headed maniac's reaction was appalling. He half knocked me out with a punch on the back of my head, and as I'd not seen the blow coming my nose went smash against the wall. The blood spurted out, and as I got up - for I had fallen - I shook myself, trying to grasp what had happened. I made a faint movement of protest. That was the very thing the huge brute had been waiting for and with a kick in the belly he flattened me again and started flogging me with his bull's pizzle. Julot couldn't bear this. He jumped on him and a frightful dog-fight began: as Julot was getting the worst of it the warders stood calmly looking on. I got up. No one took any notice of me. I glanced round to see whether I could see anything to use as a weapon. Suddenly I saw the doctor leaning over his armchair in his surgery, trying to make out what was going on in the corridor: and at the same moment I caught sight of a saucepan-lid rising under the push of the steam. The big enamel saucepan was sitting on a stove that warmed the doctor's room. The steam was meant to purify the air, no doubt.

Then, moving very fast, I caught the pot by the handles - it burnt but I didn't drop it - and in one swing I flung all the boiling water into the provost's face. He was so busy with Julot he never saw me coming. The big bastard uttered a hideous, tearing shriek. He had really copped it. There he was writhing on the ground, trying to tear off his three woollen vests, one after the other. When at last he got to the third his skin came off with it. It was a narrow-necked vest and as he ripped it off the skin of his chest, part of the skin of his neck and all on his cheek came too, sticking to the wool. His one eye had been scalded as well, and he was blind. At last he got up, hideous, oozing with blood, flayed; and Julot took advantage of it to give him a terrible kick right in the balls. The huge brute went down, vomiting and frothing at the mouth. He was finished. As for us, we lost nothing by waiting for what was coming to us. The two warders who had been watching this performance hadn't the guts to tackle us. They sounded the alarm for reinforcements. They came in from all sides and the truncheon-blows rained down on us thick as hail. I had the luck to be knocked out very early, which prevented me from feeling much.

I woke up two storeys lower down, stark naked, in a flooded black-hole. Slowly I came to. I ran my hand all over my aching body. There were at least fourteen or fifteen lumps on my head. What was the time? I couldn't tell. Down here there was neither night nor day: no light of any kind. I heard a knocking on the wall, a knocking that came from a great way off.

Thump, thump, thump, thump, thump. This knocking was how we communicated with each other. I had to knock twice if I wanted to answer. Knock: but what with? In the darkness I couldn't make out anything I could use. Fists were no good – their blows were not sharp or distinct enough. I moved over to where I imagined the door was, for it was a little less dark over there. I came up hard against bars I had not seen. Reaching out in the darkness I came to understand that the cell was closed by a door about a yard from me, and that these bars I was touching prevented me from getting to it. This way, when anyone wants to go into a dangerous prisoner's cell he is in no danger of being touched, because the prisoner is in a cage. You can talk to him, soak him, throw his food in and insult him without the least risk. But there's this advantage – he can't be hit without danger, because in order to hit him you have to open the bars.

From time to time the knocking was repeated. Who could it be that was calling me? The guy deserved to be answered, because he was running a diabolical risk if he was caught. As I moved about I very nearly came down on my face. I had trodden on something hard and round. I felt for it: a wooden spoon. I grabbed it and got ready to answer. I waited there, with my ear hard up against the wall. Thump, thump, thump, thump, pause: thump, thump. Thump-thump, I replied. These two knocks meant to the man the other end, Go ahead, I'm taking the call. The knocking began again: thump, thump, thump... The alphabet ran by quickly – a b c d e f g h i j k l m n o p: stop. He was stopping at the letter p. I struck one hard blow. Thump. So he knew I had got the letter. Then came an a, a p, an i, and so on. He was saying, 'Papi, you OK? You got it bad. I have a broken arm.' It was Julot.

We talked to one another in this way for more than two hours without worrying about being caught. We were absolutely delighted, exchanging our messages. I told him I was nothing broken, that my head was covered with bumps so that I was not wounded anywhere.

He had seen me going down, dragged by one foot, and he told me that at each stair my head had banged on the step before. He had never lost consciousness. He thought that Tribouillard had been very seriously scalded and that with the help of the wool the burns had gone deep - he was not going to get over it in a hurry.

Three very fast, repeated knocks told me there was something up. I stopped. And indeed a few moments later the door opened. There was a shout, 'Get to the back, you sod! Get to the back of your cell and stand to attention.' It was the new provost speaking. 'Batton's my name, my real name. I've got the name of the job, you see.' He lit up the black-hole and my naked body with a big ship's lantern. 'Here's something to put on. Don't you stir from back there. Here's some bread and water.* Don't stuff it all down at one go: you won't get anything more for another twenty-four hours.'

He shouted at me like a brute and then he raised the lantern to his face. I saw he was smiling, but not wickedly. He laid a finger on his lips and pointed at the things he had left. There must have been a warder in the passage, but he wanted to make me understand he was not an enemy.

True enough, inside the hunk of bread I found a big piece of boiled meat and in the pocket of the trousers - Christ, what wealth! - a packet of cigarettes and a dry lighter - a tinder lighter with a bit of tinderwick in it. Presents like this were worth millions here. Two shirts instead of one, and woollen drawers that came down to my ankles. I'll never forget him, that Batton. He was rewarding me for having wiped out Tribouillard. Before the dust-up he had only been assistant-provost. Now, thanks to me, he had risen to be the great man himself. In a word, he owed his promotion to me and he was showing his gratitude. And because we were safe with Batton, Julot and I sent one another telegrams all day long. I learnt from him that our departure for the penal settlement was no great way off - three or four months.

Two days later we were brought out of the punishment cells and taken up to the governor's office, two warders to each of us. There were three men sitting there opposite the door, behind a table. It was a kind of court. The governor acted as president, and the deputy-governor and chief warders as assessors.

* 1 lb. of bread and one-and-three-quarter pints of water.

'Ah-ha, my young friends, so here you are! What have you got to say?'

Julot was very white and his eyes were swollen: he certainly had a temperature. His arm had been broken three days ago, and he must have been in shocking pain. Quietly he said, 'My arm's broken.'

'You asked for it. That'll teach you to fly at people. You'll see the doctor when he comes. I hope it will be within a week. The waiting will be good for you, because the pain will perhaps be a lesson. But you don't think I'm going to send for a doctor especially for a fellow like you? You can just wait until the prison doctor has time to come, and he will look after you. But nevertheless I sentence you both to the black-hole until further orders.'

Julot looked full at me, right in the eye. He seemed to be saying, 'This well-dressed gent disposes of other people's lives very easily.'

I turned towards the governor again and looked at him. He thought I meant to speak. He said, 'And what about you? The sentence doesn't seem to be to your liking? Have you anything to say against it?'

I said, 'Absolutely nothing, Monsieur le Directeur. The only thing I feel is an urge to spit in your eye; but I don't like to do so, in case it should dirty my spit.'

He was taken aback, he reddened and for a moment he couldn't grasp what I'd said. But the chief warder grasped it all right. He roared at the screws, 'Take him out and look after him properly. I want to see him here again in an hour's time, begging pardon on his hands and knees. We'll tame him! I'll make him polish my boots with his tongue, soles and all. Don't be lenient with him - he's all yours.'

Two warders twisted my right arm, two others my left. I was flat on my face with my hands right up against my shoulder-blades. They put on handcuffs with a thumb-piece, fixing my left forefinger to the thumb of my right hand, and the top warder picked me up by the hair like an animal.

There's no point telling you what they did to me. I'll just say I had the handcuffs on behind my back for eleven days. I owed my life to Batton. Every day he tossed the regulation hunk of bread into my cell, but since I couldn't use my hands it was impossible to eat it. Even when I had it wedged up against the bars I couldn't manage to bite into the lump. B-

Batton also tossed in bits the size of a mouthful, and he tossed in enough to keep me alive. I heaped them up with my foot and flat on my belly I ate them like a dog. I chewed each bit very thoroughly, so as not to lose anything at all.

When they took the handcuffs off me on the twelfth day the steel had eaten in, and in some places the metal was covered with bruised flesh. The head warder got scared, particularly as I fainted away with the pain. After they had brought me round they took me to the hospital, where they cleaned me up with hydrogen peroxide. The attendant insisted on my being given an anti-tetanus shot. My arms had stiffened and could not go back to their natural position. It took more than half an hour of rubbing them with camphorated oil before I could bring them down to my sides.

I went back to the black-hole, and the chief warder, seeing the eleven hunks of bread, said, 'You can have a proper banquet now! But it's funny -- you haven't got all that thin after eleven days of starving.'

'I drank plenty of water, chief.'

'Ah, so that's it. I get you. Well, now eat plenty to get your strength back.' And he went away.

The poor bloody half-wit! He said that because he was sure I hadn't eaten anything for eleven days and because if I stuffed myself all at once I should die of it. Not bleeding likely. Towards nightfall Batton sent me in some tobacco and cigarette-paper. I smoked and smoked, breathing out into the central-heating pipe -- it never worked, of course, but at least it served that purpose.

Later I called up Julot. He too thought I had eaten nothing for eleven days and he advised me to go easy. I did not like to let him know the truth, because I was afraid of some bastard picking up the message. His arm was in plaster; he was in good form; he congratulated me on holding out. According to him the convoy was close at hand. The medical orderly had told him the shots the convicts were to be given before they left had already arrived. They usually came a month before the convoy left. Julot wasn't very cautious, for he also asked me whether I had managed to keep my charger.

Yes, I had kept it all right, but I can't describe what I had had to do not to lose it. There were some cruel wounds in my anus.

Three weeks later they took us out of the punishment cells. What was up? They gave us a marvellous shower with soap and hot water. I felt myself coming to life again. Julot was laughing like a child and Pierrot le Fou beamed all over himself with happiness.

Since we had come straight out of the black-hole we knew nothing about what was happening. The barber wouldn't answer when I whispered, 'What's up?' A wicked-looking character I didn't know said, 'I think we're amnestied from the punishment cells. Maybe they're scared of an inspector who's coming by. The great thing is they have to show us alive.' Each of us was taken to an ordinary cell. At noon, as I ate my first bowl of hot soup for forty-three days, I found a bit of wood. On it I read 'Leave in a week's time. Shots tomorrow.'

Who had sent it? I never knew. It must have been some convict who was decent enough to give us warning. He knew that if one of us knew it we all should. It was just chance that the message came to me. I called Julot right away and told him. 'Pass it on,' I said.

I heard telephoning all night long. As for me, once I'd got it out I stopped. I was too comfortable in my bed. I didn't want any sort of trouble. And the prospect of going back to the black-hole didn't attract me at all. Today isn't that any other time.

Second Exercise-Book
On the way to Guiana

Saint-Martin-de-Ré

That evening Batton sent me in three cigarettes and a piece of paper that read, 'Papillon, I know you'll remember me kindly when you go. I'm provost, but I try to hurt the prisoners as little as possible. I took the job because I've got nine children and I can't wait for a pardon. I'm going to try to earn it without doing too much harm. Good-bye. Good luck. The convoy is for the day after tomorrow.'

And in fact the next day they assembled us in the corridor of the punishment-block in groups of thirty. Medical orderlies from Caen gave us shots against tropical diseases. Three shots for each man, and three and a half pints of milk. Dega was close to me: he looked thoughtful. We no longer paid any attention to the rules of silence for we knew they couldn't put us in the punishment cell just after having our injections. We gossiped in an undertone right there in front of the screws, who dared not say anything because of the orderlies from the town.

Dega said to me, 'Are they going to have enough cellular vans to take us all in one go?'

'I don't think so.'

'It's a good way off, Saint-Martin-de-Ré, and if they take sixty a day, it'll last ten days, because we're close on six hundred here alone.'

'The great thing is to have the injections. That means you're on the list and soon you'll be in Guiana. Keep your chin up, Dega: the next stage is beginning now. Count on me, just as I count on you.'

He looked at me, his eyes shining with pleasure; he put his hand on my arm and once again he said, 'Life or death, Papi.'

There was nothing really much to say about the convoy, except that each man very nearly stifled in his little cupboard in the cellular van. The warders wouldn't let us have any air, not even by letting the doors stand just ajar. When we reached

La Rochelle two of the people in our van were found dead, asphyxiated.

There were people standing around on the quay – for Saint-Martin-de-Ré is an island and we had to take a boat to cross – and they saw those two poor unfortunate bastards being found. Not that they showed feelings of any sort for us, I may add. And since the gendarmes had to hand us over at the citadel, living or dead, they loaded the corpses on to the boat along with the rest of us.

It was not a long crossing, but it gave us a real breath of sea-air. I said to Dega, 'It smells of a break.' He smiled. And Julot, next to us, said, 'Yes. It smells of a break. I'm on my way back to the place I escaped from five years ago. Like a silly bastard I let myself be picked up just as I was on the point of carving up the fence who'd done the Judas on me at the time of my little trouble ten years ago. Let's try and stay together, because at Saint-Martin they put you ten to a cell in any old order, just as you come to hand.'

He'd got that one wrong, brother Julot. When we got there he and two others were called out and set apart from the rest. They were three men who had got away from the penal settlement: they had been retaken in France and now they were going back for the second time.

Grouped ten by ten in our cells, we began a life of waiting. We were allowed to talk and smoke, and we were very well fed. The only danger during this period was for your charger. You could never tell why, but suddenly you would be called up, stripped and very carefully searched. The whole of your body first, even the soles of your feet, and then all your clothes. 'Get dressed again!' And back you went to where you came from.

Cells: dining-hall: the courtyard where we spent hours and hours marching in single file. 'Left, right! Left, right! Left, right!' We marched in groups of five hundred convicts. A long, long crocodile: wooden shoes going clack-clack. Compulsory total silence. Then, 'Fall out!' Everyone would sit down on the ground, forming groups according to class or status. First came the men of the genuine underworld: with them it scarcely mattered where you came from, and there were Corsicans, men from Marseilles, Toulouse, Brittany, Paris and so on. There was even one from the Ardèche, and that was me. I must say this for the Ardèche – there were only two Ardéchois in the whole convoy of one thousand nine hundred men, a gamekeeper who had killed his wife, and me. Which proves that the Ardéchois are good guys. The other groups came together more or less anyhow, because more flats than sharps go to the penal settlements, more squares than wide boys. These days of waiting were called observation days. And it was true enough they observed us from every possible angle.

One afternoon I was sitting in the sun when a man came up to me. A little man, spectacled, thin. I tried to place him, but with our clothing all being the same it was very difficult.

'You're the one they call Papillon?' He had a very strong Corsican accent.

'That's right. What do you want with me?'

'Come to the latrine,' he said. And he went off.

'That guy,' said Dega, 'he's some square from Corsica. A mountain bandit, for sure. What can he possibly want with you?'

'I'm going to find out.'

I went towards the latrines in the middle of the courtyard and when I got there I pretended to piss. The man stood next to me, in the same attitude. Without looking round he said, 'I'm Pascal Matra's brother-in-law. In the visiting-room he told me to come to you if I needed help - to come in his name.'

'Yes: Pascal's a friend of mine. What do you want?'

'I can't keep my charger in any more. I've got dysentery. I don't know who to trust and I'm afraid it'll be stolen or the screws will find it. Please, Papillon, please carry it for me a few days.' And he showed me a charger much bigger than mine. I was afraid he was setting a trap - asking me to find out whether I was carrying one myself. If I said I was not sure I could hold two, he'd know. Without any expression I said, 'How much has it got in it?'

'Twenty-five thousand francs.'

Without another word I took the charger - it was very clean, too - and there in front of him I shoved it up, wondering whether a man could hold two. I had no idea. I stood up, buttoned my trousers . . . it was all right. It did not worry me.

'My name's Ignace Galgani,' he said, before going. 'Thanks, Papillon.'

I went back to Dega and privately I told him about what had happened.

'It's not too heavy?'

'No.'

'Let's forget it then.'

We tried to get in touch with men who were being sent back after having made a break: Julot or Guittou, if possible. We were eager for information – what it was like over there, how you were treated, how you ought to set about things so as to be left paired with a friend, and so on. As luck would have it we chanced upon a very odd guy, a case entirely on his own. He was a Corsican who had been born in the penal settlement. His father had been a warder there, living with his mother on the Iles du Salut. He had been born on the Ile Royale, one of the three – the others are Saint-Joseph and Devil's Island. And (irony of fate!) he was on his way back, not as a warder's son but as a convict.

He had copped twelve years for housebreaking. Nineteen; frank expression and open face. Both Dega and I saw at once that he had been sold down the river. He only had a vague notion of the underworld; but he would be useful to us because he could let us know about what was in store. He told us all about life on the islands, where he had lived for fourteen years. For example, he told us that his nurse on the islands had been a convict, a famous tough guy who had been sent down after a knife-fight in Montmartre, a duel for the love of the beautiful Casque d'Or. He gave us some very valuable advice – you had to make your break on the mainland, because on the islands it was no go at all: then again you mustn't be listed dangerous, because with that against your name you would scarcely step ashore at Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni before they shut you right away – interned you for a certain number of years or for life, according to how bad your label was. Generally speaking, less than five per cent of the convicts were interned on the islands. The others stayed on the mainland. The islands were healthy, but (as Dega had already told me) the mainland was a right mess that gradually ate the heart out of you with all sorts of diseases, death in various shapes, murder, etc.

Dega and I hoped not to be interned on the islands. But there was a hell of a feeling there in my throat – what if I had been labelled dangerous? What with my lifer, the business with Tribouillard and that other one with the governor, I'd be lucky to get away with it.

One day a rumour ran through the prison – don't go to the sick-bay whatever happens, because everybody who is too weak or too ill to stand the voyage is poisoned. It was certainly all balls. And indeed a Parisian, Francis la Passe, told us there was nothing in it. There had been a type who died of poison there, but Francis' own brother, who worked in the sick-bay, explained just what had happened.

The guy had killed himself. He was one of the top safe-breaking specialists, and it seems that during the war he had burgled the German embassy in Geneva or Lausanne for the French Intelligence. He had taken some very important papers and had given them to the French agents. The police had brought him out of prison, where he was doing five years, specially for this job. And ever since 1920 he had lived quietly, just operating once or twice a year. Every time he was picked up he brought out his little piece of blackmail and the Intelligence people hurriedly stepped in. But this time it hadn't worked. He'd got twenty years and he was to go off with us. So as to miss the boat he had pretended to be sick and had gone into hospital. According to Francis la Passe's brother a tablet of cyanide had put paid to his capers. Safe deposits and the Intelligence Service could sleep in peace.

The courtyard was full of stories, some true, some false. We listened to them in either case – it passed the time.

Whenever I went to the latrines, either in the courtyard or in the cell, Dega had to go with me, on account of the chargers. He stood in front of me while I was at it and shielded me from over-inquisitive eyes. A charger is a bleeding nuisance at any time, but I had two of the things still, for Galgani was getting sicker and sicker. And there was a mystery about the whole affair: the charger I shoved up last always came out last, and the first always first. I've no idea how they turned about in my guts, but that's how it was.

At the barber's yesterday someone had a go at murdering Clousiot while he was being shaved. Two knife-stabs right next to his heart. By some miracle he didn't die. I heard about the whole thing from a friend of his. It was an odd story and I'll tell it one day. The attack was by way of settling accounts. The man who nearly got him died six years after this at Cayenne, having eaten bichromate of potassium in his lentils. He died in frightful agony. The attendant who helped the doctor at the post-mortem brought us five inches of gut. It had seventeen holes in it. Two months later this man's murderer was found strangled in his hospital bed. We never knew who by.

It was twelve days now that we had been at Saint-Martin-de-Ré. The fortress was crammed to overflowing. Sentries patrolled on the ramparts night and day.

A fight broke out between two brothers, in the showers. They fought like wild-cats and one of them was put into our cell. André Baillard was his name. He couldn't be punished, he told me, because it was the authorities' fault: the screws had been ordered not to let the brothers meet on any account whatsoever. When you knew their story, you could see why.

André had murdered an old woman with some money, and his brother Emile hid the proceeds. Emile was shipped for theft and got three years. One day, when he was in the punishment cell with some other men, he let the whole thing out: he was mad with his brother for not sending him in money for cigarettes and he told them everything - he'd get André, he said; and he explained how it was André who had done the old woman in and how it was he, Emile, who had hidden the money. What's more, he said, when he got out he wouldn't give André a sou. A prisoner hurried off to tell the governor what he had heard. Things moved fast. André was arrested and the two brothers were sentenced to death. In death alley at the Santé their condemned cells were next door to one another. Each put in for a reprieve. Emile's was granted the forty-third day, but André's was turned down. Yet out of consideration for André's feelings Emile was kept in the condemned cell and the two brothers did their daily exercise together, the one behind the other, with chains on their legs.

On the forty-sixth day at half-past four in the morning André's door opened. They were all there, the governor, the registrar and the prosecuting counsel who had asked for his head. This was the execution. But just as the governor stepped forward to speak André's lawyer appeared, running, followed by someone else who handed the prosecutor a paper. Everyone went back into the corridor. André's throat was so tight and stiff he couldn't swallow his spit. This wasn't possible - executions were never interrupted once they had begun. And yet this one was. Not until the next day, after hours of dreadful doubt, did he hear from his lawyer that just before his execution President Doumer had been murdered by Gorguloff. But Doumer hadn't died right away. The lawyer had - and there all night outside the hospital, having told the Minister of Justice that if the President died before the time of the execution (between half past four and five in the morning) he would call for a postponement on the grounds that there was no head of state. Doumer died at two minutes past four. Just time to warn the ministry, jump into a cab, followed by the man with the order for putting it off; but he got there three minutes too late to stop them opening André's door. The two brothers' sentences were commuted to transportation and hard labour for life: for on the day of the new president's election the lawyer went to Versailles, and as soon as Albert Lebrun was chosen, the lawyer handed him the petition for a reprieve. No president ever refuses the first reprieve he is asked for. 'Lebrun signed,' said André, 'and here I am, mate, alive and well, on my way to Guiana.' I looked at this character who had escaped the guillotine and I said to myself that in spite of all I had gone through it was nothing to what he must have suffered.

Yet I never made friends with him. The idea of his killing a poor old woman to rob her made me feel sick. This André was always a very lucky man. He murdered his brother on the Ile Saint-Joseph some time later. Several convicts saw him. Emile was fishing, standing there on a rock and thinking about nothing but his rod. The noise of the heavy waves drowned every other sound. André crept up on his brother from behind with a thick ten-foot bamboo in his hand and shoved him off his balance with a single push. The place was stiff with sharks and precious soon Emile had become their lunch. He wasn't there at the evening roll-call and he was put down as having disappeared during an attempt to escape. No one talked about him any more. Only four or five convicts gathering coconuts high up on the island had seen what happened. Everyone knew, of course, except for the screws. André Baillard never heard another word about it.

He was let out of internment for 'good conduct' and he had a privileged status at Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. They gave him a little cell to himself. He had a disagreement with another convict and one day he treacherously asked him into this cell: there he killed him with a stab right to the heart. They wore his plea of self-defence and he was acquitted. Then, when the penal settlement was abolished, he was pardoned, still on account of his 'good conduct'.

Saint-Martin-de-Ré was stuffed with prisoners. Two quite different sorts: eight hundred or a thousand real convicts and nine relégués – men in preventive detention. To be a convict you have to have done something serious or at least to have been accused of an important crime. The mildest sentence is seven years hard labour and then it goes up by stages to life, or perpetuity, as they say. A commuted death-sentence automatically means perpetuity. Preventive detention, or relegation, that's something quite different. If he's sentenced from three to seven times, a man can be relegated. It's true they're all incorrigible thieves and you can see that society has to protect itself. But still it's shameful that a civilized nation should have this extra sentence of preventive detention. They are small-time thieves – clumsy operators, since they are shop-ped so often – who get relegation (and in my time that meant the same as life) and who have never stolen as much as ten thousand francs in their whole career as thieves. That's the greatest bit of meaningless balls. French civilization has to offer. A nation has no right to revenge itself nor to wipe out the people who hinder the workings of society. They are people who ought to be treated rather than be punished in such an inhuman way.

Now we had been seventeen days at Saint-Martin-de-Ré. We knew the name of the ship that was to carry us to the settlement: she was the Martinière. She was going to take one thousand eight hundred and seventy prisoners aboard. That morning eight or nine hundred convicts were assembled in the inner court of the fortress. We had been standing there for about an hour, lined up in ranks of ten, filling the square. A gate opened and in came men who were not dressed like the warders we were used to. They wore good, military kind of clothes: sky-blue. It wasn't the same as a gendarme and it wasn't the same as a soldier. They each had a broad belt with a holster; the revolver grip showed. There were about eighty of them. Some had stripes. They were all sunburnt and they were of any age between thirty-five and fifty. The old ones looked pleasanter than the young, who threw a chest and looked important – gave themselves airs. Along with these men's officers there came the governor of Saint-Martin-de-Ré a gendarmerie colonel, three or four quacks in overseas uniform and two priests in white cassocks. The gendarme colonel picked up a speaking-trumpet and put it to his mouth. We expected shun! but nothing of the kind. He s carefully, all of you. From this moment on you are taken over by the authorities of the Ministry of Justice, representing the penitentiary administration of French Guiana, whose administrative centre is the town of Cayenne. Major Barrot, I hereby hand over to you the eight hundred and sixteen convicts now present, and this is the list of their names. Be so good as to check that they are all here.'

The roll-call began straight away. 'So-and-so, present. So-and-so ...' etc. It lasted two hours and everything was correct. Then we watched the two authorities exchanging signatures on a little table brought for the purpose.

Major Barrot had as many stripes as the colonel, but they were gold and not the gendarmerie's silver: he took his turn at the megaphone.

'Transportees, from now on that is the name you'll always be called by - transportee so-and-so or transportee such-and-such a number, - the number that will be allotted to you. From now on you are under the special penal settlement laws and regulations: you come under its own particular tribunals which will take the necessary decision with regard to you as the case arises. For crimes committed in the penal settlement these courts can condemn you to anything from imprisonment to death. These disciplinary sentences, such as prison or solitary confinement, are of course served in different establishments that belong to the administration. The officers you see opposite you are called supervisors. When you speak to them you will say 'Monsieur le surveillant'. After you have eaten you will be given a kitbag containing the settlement uniform. Everything has been provided for and you will not need anything but what is in the bag. Tomorrow you will go aboard the Martinière. We shall travel together. Don't lose heart at leaving this country: you will be better off in the settlement than in solitary confinement in France. You can talk, amuse yourselves, sing and smoke; and you needn't be afraid of being treated roughly so long as you behave yourselves. I ask you to leave the settling of your private disagreements until we reach Guiana. During the voyage discipline has to be very strict, as I hope you will understand. If there are any men among you who don't feel up to making the voyage, they may report to the infirmary, where they will be examined by the medical officers who are accompanying the convoy. I wish you all a pleasant trip.' The ceremony was over,

'Well, Dega, what do you think about it?'

'Papillon, old cock, I see I was right when I told you that the other convicts were the worst danger we'd have to cope with. That piece of his about "leave the settling of your private disagreements until we reach Guiana" meant plenty. Christ, what killings and murdering must go on there!'

'Never worry about that: just rely on me.'

I found Francis la Passe and said, 'Is your brother still a medical attendant?'

'Yes. He's not a real convict, only a bleeding relégué.'

'Get into touch with him as quick as possible: ask him to give you a scalpel. If he wants money for it, tell me how much. I'll pay.'

Two hours later I had a very strong steel-handled scalpel. Its only fault was that it was rather big; but it was a formidable weapon.

I went and sat very near the latrines in the middle of the courtyard and I sent for Galgani to give him back his charger; but it was going to be very hard to find him in that milling crowd – a huge yard crammed with eight hundred men. We had never caught sight of Julot, Guittou or Suzini since we got there.

The advantage of communal life is that you belong to a new society, if this could be called a society – you live in it, talk in it, become part of it. There are so many things to say, to hear and to do that you no longer have any time to think. And it seemed to me, as I saw how the past faded away, growing less important in comparison with everyday life, it seemed to me that once you got to the penal settlement you must almost forget what you have been, how or why you had landed up there, and concentrate upon one thing alone – escape. I was wrong, because the most important and most engrossing thing is above all to keep yourself alive.

Where were the cops, the members of the jury, the assizes, the judges, my wife, my father, my friends? They were there all right, thoroughly alive, each one in his place in my heart; but what with the intense excitement of leaving, of this great leap into the unknown, these new friendships and new aspects of life, they seemed to have less importance than before. But that was only a mere impression. When I wanted, and whenever my mind chose to open each one's file, they were all instantly alive once more.

Now here was Galgani, being led towards me, for even with his thick pebble-lenses he could scarcely see. He looked better. He came up to me and shook my hand without a word.

I said, 'I want to give you back your charger. Now you're well you can carry it yourself. It's too much responsibility for me during the voyage; and then who knows whether we'll be in touch at the settlement, or whether we'll even see one another? So it's better you should have it back.' Galgani looked at me unhappily. 'Come on,' I said. 'Come into the latrine and I'll give it back to you.'

'No, I don't want it. You keep it - I give it to you. It's yours.'

'Why do you say that?'

'I don't want to get myself murdered for my charger. I'd rather live without money than have my throat slit for it. I give it to you, for after all there's no reason why you should risk your life, looking after my lolly for me. If you run the risk it might as well be for your own sake.'

'You're scared, Galgani. Have you been threatened already? Does anyone suspect you're loaded?'

'Yes: there are three Arabs who follow me all the time. That's why I've never come to see you, so they won't suspect we're in touch. Every time I go to the latrine, day or night, one of these three comes and puts himself next to me. Without making it obvious I've shown them absolutely plain that I'm not loaded, but in spite of all I can do they never let up. They think someone else has my charger; they don't know who; and they keep behind me to see when I'll get it back again.'

I looked hard at Galgani and I saw he was terror-stricken, really persecuted. I said, 'What part of the courtyard do they keep to?'

He said, 'Over towards the kitchen and the laundry.'

'Right, you stay here. I'll be back. But no, now I come to think of it, you come with me.' With Galgani at my side I went over towards the Arabs. I'd taken the scalpel out of my cap and I had the blade up my right sleeve, with the handle in my palm. When we had crossed the court, sure enough I saw them. Four of them. Three Arabs and a Corsican, a character by the name of Girando. I grasped the situation right away. It was the Corsican who had been cold-shouldered by the real hard men and who had put the Arabs up to this job. He must have known that Galgani was Pascal Matra's brother-in-law and that it wasn't possible for him not to have a charger.

'Hi, Mokrane. OK?'

'OK, Papillon. You OK too?'

'Hell, no. Far from it. I've come to see you guys to tell you Galgani is my friend. If anything happens to him, it's you who cop it first Girando. And then the rest of you. And you can take that just how you like.'

Mokrane stood up. He was as tall as me – about five foot eight – and as broad-shouldered. The words had needled him and he was on the point of moving in to start things when I flashed the scalpel and with it right there shining-new in my hand I said, 'If you stir I'll kill you like a dog.'

He was knocked sideways by seeing me armed in a place where everybody was searched all the time, and he was shaken by my attitude and the length of the blade. He said, 'I got up to talk, not to fight.'

I knew it was not true, but it was to my advantage to save his face in front of his friends. I left the door open for him wide and handsome. 'OK, since you just got up to talk . . .'

'I didn't know Galgani was your friend. I thought he was a square. And you know very well, Papillon, that when you're skint you have to find cash somewhere to make a break.'

'Fair enough. You certainly have the right to struggle for your life, Mokrane, like anyone else. Only keep away from Galgani, see? You've got to look somewhere else.'

He held out his hand: I shook it hard. Jesus, I was well out of that one; for looking at it rightly, if I had killed that guy, I should never have left the next day. A little later I realized I had made a bleeding error. Galgani and I walked away. I said, 'Don't tell anyone about this caper. I don't want to have old Dega bawling me out.'

I tried to persuade Galgani to take the charger. He said, 'Tomorrow, before we leave.' The next day he lay so low that I set out for penal with two chargers aboard.

That night not one of us – and we were about eleven in the cell – not one of us said a word. For we all had more or less the same thought in our minds – this was the last day we should pass on French soil. Each of us was more or less filled with homesickness at the idea of leaving France for ever, with an unknown land and an unknown way of life at the end of our journey.

Dega did not speak. He sat next to me close to the barred door on to the corridor, where the air was a little fresher. I felt completely at sea. The information we had about what was coming was so contradictory that I did not know whether to be pleased or wretched or downright hopeless.

The other men in the cell were all genuine underworld characters. The only one who did not belong was the little Corsican who had been born in the settlement. All these men were in a grey, floating state of mind. The seriousness of the moment and its importance had made them almost entirely dumb. The cigarette-smoke wafted out of the cell into the corridor like a cloud, and if you didn't want your eyes to sting you had to sit lower than the heavy fog-blanket. No one slept except for André Baillard; it was natural enough for him, since his life had already been lost, as it were. As far as he was concerned everything else could only be unlooked-for heaven.

My life passed before my eyes like a film.— childhood in a family filled with love, affectionate discipline, decent ways and good-heartedness; the wild flowers, the murmur of streams, the taste of the walnuts, peaches and plums that our garden gave us in such quantities; the smell of the mimosa that flowered every spring in front of our door; the outside of our house, and the inside with my family there — all this ran by before my eyes. It was a talking picture, one in which I heard the voice of my mother (she had loved me so), and then my father's — always affectionate and kind — and the barking of Clara, his gun-dog, calling me into the garden to play. The boys and girls of my childhood, the ones I had played with during the happiest days of my life. All this — this film I was watching without ever having meant to see it, this magic lantern that my subconscious had lit against my will — all this filled the night of waiting before the leap into the great unknown with sweet, gentle memories and emotions.

Now was the time to get things clear in my mind. Let's see: I was twenty-six and very fit; I had five thousand six hundred francs belonging to me in my gut and twenty-five thousand belonging to Galgani. Dega, there beside me, had ten thousand. It seemed to me I could count on forty thousand francs, for if Galgani couldn't look after his dough here he'd be even less capable of doing so aboard the ship or in Guiana. What's more, he knew it: and that's why he never came to ask for his charger. So I could count on that money — taking Galgani with me, of course. He'd have to profit by it – it was his cash, not mine. I'd use it for his good; but I should gain by it too. Forty thousand francs was a lot of money, so I should find it easy to buy helpers – convicts serving their time, men who had been let out, warders.

The conclusion was positive. As soon as I got there I must escape together with Dega and Galgani, and that was the only thing I was to concentrate upon at this point. I touched the scalpel, and the feel of the cold steel handle pleased me. It gave me confidence, having such a formidable weapon as that upon me. I had already proved how useful it could be in that business with the Arabs.

About three o'clock in the morning the men for solitary piled up eleven kitbags in front of the bars of the cell: they were all crammed full and each had a big label on it. I could read one that hung in through the bars. C –, Pierre, thirty years old, five foot eight and a half, waist size forty-two, shoes eight and a half, number x. This Pierre C – was Pierrot le Fou, a guy from Bordeaux who had got twenty years hard in Paris for homicide.

He was a good type, a decent, straightforward member of the underworld, and I knew him well. The label showed me how precise and well-organized the authorities in charge of the penal settlement were. It was better than the army, where they make you try your things on by guesswork. Here everything was written down and so each man would get things his own size. I could see from a bit of canvas at the top of the bag that the uniform was white with vertical red stripes. Dressed like that, you could scarcely pass unnoticed.

I tried to force my mind to make pictures of the assizes, the jurymen, the prosecuting counsel, etc. It flatly refused to obey me, and I could only get it to produce ordinary images. It came to me that if you want to live through anything imaginary as vividly as I did at the Conciergerie or at Beaulieu you have to be alone, utterly alone. It was a relief to understand this, and I saw that the communal life that was coming would bring other needs with it, other reactions and other plans.

Pierrot le Fou came up to the bars and said, 'OK, Papi?'

'What about you?'

'Well, as far as I'm concerned, I'd always dreamed of going to America; but I was a gambler, so I could never save enough for the trip. The cops had the idea of making me a present of it. You can't deny it was kind of them, Papillon.' He was speaking naturally. There was no bragging about what he said. You could feel that right down he was sure of himself. 'The cops' free trip to America has something to be said for it, you know. I'd much rather go to Guiana than sweat out fifteen years of solitary in France.'

'As I see it going crazy in a cell or just falling apart in some solitary confinement hole in France is even worse than dying of leprosy or yellow fever.'

'That's how I see it too,' he said.

'Look, Pierrot, this label is yours.'

He bent down, looking very close to read it, and slowly he made out the words. 'I can't wait to put these clothes on. I've a mind to open the bag - no one will say anything. After all, they're meant for me.'

'You leave it alone and wait till they tell you. This isn't the time to ask for trouble, Pierre. I need some peace and quiet.' He grasped what I meant and moved away from the bars.

Louis Dega looked at me and said, 'This is our last night, boy. Tomorrow they're taking us far away from our beautiful country.'

'Our beautiful country hasn't got such a very beautiful system of justice, Dega. Maybe we'll come to know countries that aren't so beautiful but that have a slightly more human way of treating people who have slipped up.' I didn't think I was so near the truth: the future was to show me that I was dead right. Total silence fell again.

Leaving for Guiana

Six o'clock, and everything was in motion. Convicts came round with coffee and then four warders appeared. Today they were in white; they still carried their revolvers. Spotless white tunics and buttons that shone like gold. One had three gold chevrons on his left sleeve: nothing on his shoulders.

'Transportees, come out into the corridor in twos. Each man will find the bag with his name on the label. Take the bag and move back against the wall, facing the corridor with your bag in front of you.'

It took twenty minutes before we were all lined up with our kitbags at our feet.

'Strip: roll up your things, put them into the jacket, bundle it all up and tie the sleeves ... right. You over there, pick up the rolls and put them into the cell. Now dress. Put on vest, drawers, striped drill trousers, drill jacket, shoes and socks ... You're all dressed?'

'Yes, Monsieur le surveillant.'

'Right. Keep the woollen jersey out of the bag in case it rains or turns cold. Bags on your left shoulder. In double file, follow me.'

With the sergeant in front, two warders at the sides and the fourth behind, our little column moved out to the courtyard. In under two hours eight hundred and ten convicts were lined up there. Forty men were called out, including Dega and me and the three who were being sent back after their escape - Julot, Galgani and Santini. These forty men were lined up in rows of ten. Each rank of the column that was taking shape had a warder beside it. No chains, no handcuffs. Three yards in front of us, walking backwards, ten gendarmes. They faced us, rifle in hand, and they marched like that all the way, each steered by another gendarme holding his shoulder-belt.

The great gate of the citadel opened, and slowly the column began to move. As the line emerged from the fortress so more gendarmes, carrying rifles or light machine-guns, joined the convoy, staying a couple of yards from it and keeping pace. Other gendarmes held back a huge crowd that had come to watch us leaving for the penal settlements. Half way to the quay I heard a quiet whistle from the windows of a house. I looked up and saw Nénette, my wife, and my friend Antoine D - at one window: Paula, Dega's wife, and his friend Antoine Giletti were at the other. Dega saw them too, and we marched with our eyes fixed on those windows as long as we could see them. That was the last time I ever set eyes on my wife: or my friend Antoine, who died much later in an air-raid on Marseilles. No one spoke. There was a total silence. No prisoner, no warder, no gendarme, no person in the crowd disturbed that truly heart-rending moment when everyone knew that one thousand eight hundred men were about to vanish from ordinary life for ever.

We went aboard. The forty in front – that is to say us – were sent to the bottom of the hold, into a cage with thick bars. There was a marker on it. I read 'Hall no. 1. 40 men top special category. Strict, continual surveillance.' Each man was given a rolled-up hammock. There were quantities of rings to hang them by. Someone seized me in his arms: it was Julot. He knew all about this, because he had already made the voyage ten years before. He knew how to cope. He said, 'This way, quick. Hang your bag where you're going to hang your hammock. This place is near two closed port-holes, but they'll be opened when we're at sea, and we'll be able to breathe better here than anywhere else in the cage.'

I introduced Dega. We were talking when a man came our way. Julot put out his arm and blocked the path. He said, 'Never come over this side if you want to reach penal alive. Get it?' 'Yes,' said the other man. 'You know why?' 'Yes.' 'Then bugger off.' The guy went. Dega was delighted with this show of strength and he didn't hide it. 'With you two, I'll be able to sleep easy.' Julot said, 'With us, you're safer here than in any villa on the coast that has a single window open.'

The voyage lasted eighteen days. Only one piece of excitement. Everyone was woken by an enormous shriek in the night. A character was found dead with a long knife deep between his shoulders. The knife had been driven from below upwards and it had passed through the hammock before reaching him. A really dangerous weapon, a good eight inches long in the blade. Immediately twenty-five or thirty warders turned their revolvers or rifles on us, shouting, 'Everyone strip. Double quick time!'

Everyone stripped. I saw there was going to be a search and I put my bare right foot over the scalpel, taking my weight on the left, because the blade was cutting into me. Nevertheless my foot covered the scalpel. Four warders came inside the cage and began rummaging through the shoes and clothes. Before they came in they left their weapons outside and the door was closed on them, but those who were the other side of the bars kept watch on us, keeping us covered. 'The first man to stir is a goner,' said a head screw's voice. During the search they found three knives, two long roofing-nails, sharpened, a corkscrew, and a gold charger. Six men were brought out on to the deck, still naked. Major Barrot, the officer in command of the convoy, appeared together with two colonial army doctors and the captain of the ship. When the screws left our cage everyone dressed again, without waiting for the order. I picked up my scalpel.

The warders moved back to the far end of the deck. In the middle there was Barrot, just by the companion-way, with the other officers. The six naked men were lined up opposite them, standing to attention.

'This is his,' said the screw who had conducted the search, picking up a knife and pointing to its owner.

'Fair enough. It's mine.'

'Right,' said Barrot. 'He'll make the rest of the voyage in a cell over the engines.'

Each man was pointed out as responsible either for the nails, or the corkscrew or the knives, and each acknowledged that the weapon that had been found belonged to him. Each one, still naked, went up the ladder, accompanied by two screws. Lying there on the floor there was still one knife and the gold charger: and only one man for both of them. He was young – twenty-three or twenty-five – well-built, at least five foot ten, athletic, blue eyes.

'This is yours, isn't it?' said the screw, holding out the gold charger.

'Yes, it's mine.'

'What's in it?' asked Major Barrot, taking it.

'Three hundred pounds sterling, two hundred dollars and two five-carat diamonds.'

'Right. We'll have a look.' He opened it. The major was surrounded by other people and we couldn't see a thing. But we heard him say, 'Just so. What's your name?'

'Salvidia Romeo.'

'You're Italian?'

'Yes, sir.'

'You'll not be punished for the charger: but you will be for the knife.'

'Excuse me, but the knife isn't mine.'

'Don't talk balls,' said the screw, 'I found it in your shoe.'

'I say again the knife isn't mine.'

'So I'm lying, am I?'

'No, you're just mistaken.'

'Whose is the knife, then?' asked Major Barrot. 'If it's not yours, it must be somebody's.'

'It's not mine, that's all.'

'If you don't want to be put in the punishment cell – and you'll fry there, because it's over the boiler – just tell me whose the knife is.'

'I don't know.'

'Are you trying to make a fool of me? A knife's found in your shoe and you don't know whose it is? Do you think I'm a fool? Either it's yours or you know whose it is. Speak up.'

'It's not mine and it's not for me to say whose it is. I'm not an informer. You don't by any chance think I look like a bleeding prison officer, do you?'

'Warder, put on the handcuffs. This kind of undisciplined conduct costs a packet, my friend.'

The two commanding officers, the captain of the ship and the head of the convoy, talked privately. The captain gave an order to a quartermaster, who went up on deck. A few moments later a Breton sailor appeared, a giant of a man, with a wooden bucket of sea water and a rope as thick as your wrist. The convict was tied to the bottom step of the ladder, on his knees. The sailor wetted the rope in the bucket and then deliberately, with all his strength, he set about flogging the poor devil's back and buttocks. Not a sound came from the convict: blood flowed from his buttocks and his sides. A shout from our cage broke the graveyard silence. 'You bloody sods!'

That was all that was needed to start everybody roaring. 'Murderers! Swine! Bastards!' The more they threatened to fire if we did not shut up the more we bellowed until suddenly the captain shouted, 'Turn on the steam!'

Sailors turned various wheels and jets of steam shot out at us with such force that in a split second everyone was flat on his belly. The jets came at chest-height. We were all struck with panic. The men who had been scalded dared not cry out. The whole thing lasted under a minute, but it terrified every man there.

'I hope you obstinate brutes have grasped what I mean. The slightest trouble, and I turn on the steam. You get me? Stand up!'

Only three men had been seriously scalded. They were taken to the sick-bay. The man who had been flogged was put back with us. Six years later he died while making a break with me.

During those eighteen days of the voyage we had plenty of time to try to learn about what was coming or to get at least some notion of the penal settlement. Yet when we got there nothing turned out quite as we had expected, although Julot had done his very best to pass on his knowledge.

We did know that Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni was a village seventy-five miles from the sea on a river called the Maroni. Julot told us about it. 'That's the village that has the prison, the one that's the centre of the penal settlement. That's where they sort you out according to your category. The preventive detentions go straight to a prison called Saint-Jean, about ninety miles away. The right convicts are separated into three groups. First the ones labelled very dangerous: as soon as they arrive they're called out and shoved into cells in the punishment-block until they can be transferred to the Iles du Salut. There they are interned either for a given number of years or for life. These islands are three hundred miles and more from Saint-Laurent and sixty from Cayenne. There are three of them. Royale, the biggest; Saint-Joseph, which has the settlement's solitary-confinement prison; and Devil's Island, the smallest of them all. Apart from a very few exceptions, convicts don't go to Devil's Island. The people there are political. Then comes dangerous, second category: they stay at the Saint-Laurent camp, and they're put to gardening and working on the land. Whenever there's a need for men they're sent to the very tough camps - Camp Forestier, Charvin, Cascade, Crique Rouge and Kilomètre 42, the one they call the death camp. Then there's the ordinary category: they're given jobs in the offices and kitchens, or put to cleaning in the village and the camp, or they're sent to the different workshops - carpentry, painting, blacksmith's shop, electricity, mattress-making, tailor's shop, laundry and so on. So zero hour is the moment you get there. If you're called out and taken to a cell, that means you're going to be interned on the islands, so good-bye to any hope of escape. There's only one chance, and that's to mutilate yourself quick - open your knee or your belly so as to get into the hospital and escape from there. At all costs you have to avoid going to the islands. There's one other hope: if the ship that's to take the internees to the islands isn't ready you can bring out your money and offer it to the medical orderly. He'll give you a shot of turpentine in a joint or draw a urine-soaked hair through a cut so that it'll go bad. Or he'll give you sulphur to inhale and then tell the doctor you've got a temperature of 102. During those few days of waiting you have to get into hospital, no matter what it costs.

'If you're not called out but left with the others in the huts at the camp, then you have time to get working. If this happens, you mustn't look for a job inside the camp. What you want to do is to pay the clerk to be given a scavenger's or a sweeper's job in the village, or else to get taken on at an outside firm's sawmills. Going out of the prison to work and coming back into the camp every night gives you time to get in touch with the time-expired convicts who live in the village or with the Chinese, so that they can get your break ready for you. Avoid the camps outside the village. Everybody dies quickly in them - there are some where no one has been able to stand it for three months. Out there in the deep bush, men are forced to cut a cubic yard of wood every day.'

Throughout the voyage Julot had gone over and over all this valuable information. For his part, he was quite ready. He knew that he was going straight to the punishment cell, because he was an escaped man who had been retaken. So he had a very small blade, not much more than a penknife, in his charger: When we got there he was going to take it out and rip his knee open. As we came down the gangway he was going to fall, right there in front of everyone. He thought he'd be taken straight from the quay to the hospital. And that indeed was exactly what happened.

Saint-Laurent-Du-Maroni

The warders had gone off in relays to change. Each in turn came back dressed in white with a sun-helmet instead of a képi. Julot said, 'We're almost there.' It was appallingly hot, for they had shut the port-holes. Through the glass you could see the bush. So we were in the Maroni. The water was muddy. Untouched virgin forest, green and impressive. Disturbed by the ship's siren, birds rose and flew across the sky. We went very slowly, and that allowed us to pay close attention to the thick, dark-green, overflowing vegetation. We saw the first wooden houses, with their corrugated iron roofs. Black men and women stood at their doors, watching the ship go by. They were quite used to seeing it unload its human cargo, and so they never even bothered to wave as it passed. Three blasts on the siren and the churning of the propeller told us that we were there, and then the engines stopped entirely. Not a sound: you could have heard the buzzing of a fly.

Nobody spoke. Julot had his knife open and he was cutting his trousers at the knee, making the edges of the slash look like a tear. It was only on deck that he was going to cut his knee, so as not to leave a trail of blood. The warders opened the door of the cage and lined us up in threes. We were in the fourth rank, with Julot between Dega and me. Up on deck. It was two o'clock in the afternoon and suddenly the blazing sun hit my cropped head and my eyes. We were formed up on the deck and then we moved towards the gangway. When the column hesitated for a moment, just as the first man stepped on to the gangway, I held Julot's kitbag in place on his shoulder while he used both hands to stretch the skin of his knee, drive the knife in and slash through three or four inches of flesh in one sweep. He passed me the knife and held the kitbag himself. The moment we set foot on the gangway he fell and rolled right down to the bottom. They picked him up, and finding that he was hurt they called the stretcher-bearers. Everything ran just as he had worked it out, and he disappeared, carried by two men on a stretcher.

A motley crowd watched us with some curiosity. Negroes, half-castes, Indians, Chinese and wrecks of white men (they were certainly freed convicts) stared at each one of us as he set foot on land and lined up behind the others. On the other side there were warders, well-dressed civilians, women in summer dresses and children, all with sun-helmets on. They too watched the new arrivals. When there were two hundred of us ashore, the column moved off. We marched for some ten minutes and came to a very high gate made of massive beams with the words Penitentiary of Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni on it. The gate opened and we went in.

When we reached the middle of the court a voice shouted, 'Halt. Put your bags down in front of you. You there, hand out the hats.' They gave us each a straw hat, and we needed it – two or three men had already dropped from sunstroke. Dega and I exchanged a glance, for a screw with stripes had a list in his hand. We thought of what Julot had told us. Guittou was called. 'Here!' he said. Two warders took him away. Suzuni, the same: Girasol likewise.

'Jules Pignard!'

'Jules Pignard (that was our Julot) has been hurt. He's gone to hospital.'

'Right.' Those were the internees for the islands. Then the warder went on, 'Listen carefully. Each man whose name I call is to step from the ranks with his kitbag on his shoulder and go and line up in front of that yellow hut, number one.'

The roll-call went on, with So-and-so – Present, etc., and Dega, Carrier and I ended up with the others, in line over against the hut. They opened the door and we went into a rectangular hall some twenty yards long. Down the middle ran a passage about two yards wide with an iron bar on either side, the whole length of the room. Canvas hammocks were slung between the bar and the wall, and each held a blanket. Every man chose his own place. Dega, Pierrot le Fou, Santori, Grandet and I moved in all next to one another, and little groups began to take shape at once. I went down to the far end of the room: showers on the right, latrines on the left: no running water.

The men who had left the ship after us began to arrive, and we watched them, clinging to the bars over the windows. Louis Dega, Pierrot le Fou and I were delighted – since we were in an ordinary barrack-room it meant we weren't going to be interned. Otherwise we'd already have been put into a cell, as Julot had explained. Everybody was very pleased until about five o'clock, when it was all over; but then Grandet said 'It's funny, but they haven't called out a single man for internment in this whole convoy. Odd. Still, so much the better, as far as I'm concerned.' Grandet was the man who stole the safe from one of the central prisons, a job that had made the whole country laugh.

In the tropics day and night come without any sort of twilight. You go straight from the one to the other, and at the same time all through the year. Suddenly, at half-past six, it's night. And at half past six two old convicts brought two oil lamps that they hung on a hook in the ceiling and that gave a very little light. Three-quarters of the room was perfectly dark. By nine o'clock everybody was asleep, for now that the excitement of our arrival was over, we were quite overcome by the heat. Not a breath of air, and everyone was stripped to his drawers. My hammock was between Dega and Pierrot le Fou: we whispered a while and then went back to sleep.

It was still dark the next morning when the bugle blew. Everyone got up, washed and dressed. They gave us coffee and a hunk of bread. There was a plank fixed to the wall for your bread, mug and other belongings. At nine o'clock two warders came in, together with a young convict dressed in white without stripes. The two screws were Corsicans, and they talked Corsican to the convicts from their country. Meanwhile the medical orderly walked about the room. When he reached me he said, 'How goes it, Papi? Don't you recognize me?'

'No.'

'I'm Sierra l'Algérois: I knew you in Paris, at Dante's.'

'Oh, yes, I recognize you now. But you were sent down in '29. It's '33 now: how come you're still here?'

'Yes. There's no getting out of here in a hurry. You report sick, will you? Who's this guy?'

'He's Dega, a friend of mine.'

'I'll put you down for the doctor too, Dega. Papi, you've got dysentery. And you, dad, you've got fits of asthma. I'll see you at the medical at eleven o'clock. There's something I've got to tell you.' He went on his way, calling out 'Who's sick there?', going over to those who held up their hands, and writing down their names. When he came back he had a warder with him, an elderly sunburnt man. 'Papillon, let me introduce my boss, Medical-Warder Bartiloni. Monsieur Bartiloni, these two are the friends I told you about.'

'OK, Sierra, we'll see to that at the medical: rely on me.'

At eleven they came for us. There were nine men going sick. We walked through the camp among the hutments. When we reached a newer building than the rest, the only one painted white with a red cross on it, we went in and found a waiting-room with about sixty men in it. Two warders in each corner.

Sierra appeared, in spotless medical overalls. He said, 'You, you and you: go in.' We went into a room that was obviously the doctor's. He talked to the three older men in Spanish. There was one Spaniard there I recognized straight away: he was Fernandez, the one who killed the three Argentines at the Café de Madrid in Paris. After they had exchanged a few words Sierra showed him to a little room communicating with the main hall and then came back to us. 'Papi, let me embrace you. I'm delighted to be able to do you and your friend a very good turn. You're both of you down for internment ... No, let me finish. You're down for life, Papillon; and Dega, you're down for five years. You got any cash?'

'Then give five hundred francs apiece and tomorrow morning you'll be sent to hospital. You for dysentery. And you, Dega, you must bang on the door during the night - or better still, let someone call the screw and ask for the orderly, because Dega's asthma's killing him. I'll look after the rest of it. There's just one thing I ask of you, Papillon, and that is to give me fair warning if you clear out: I'll be there when you say. They'll be able to keep you in the hospital for a month, at a hundred francs a week each. You must move fast.'

Fernandez came out of the little room and in front of us he handed Sierra five hundred francs. Then I went in, and when I came out I gave him not a thousand but fifteen hundred francs. He refused the five hundred. I did not like to press him. He said, 'This dough you're giving me's for the screw. I don't want anything for myself. We're friends, aren't we?'

The next day Dega, Fernandez and I were in an enormous cell in the hospital. Dega was hurried in during the middle of the night. The attendant in charge of the ward was a man of thirty-five called Chatal. He knew all about us three from Sierra. When the doctor came round he was to show a motion that would make me look like I was falling apart with amoebias. Ten minutes before the inspection he was to burn a little sulphur for Dega and make him breathe the gas with a towel over his head. Fernandez had an enormously swollen face: he had pierced the skin inside his cheek and had blown as hard as he could for an hour. He had done it so conscientiously that the swelling closed one eye. The cell was on the first floor and there were about seventy patients in it, many of them dysentery cases. I asked Chatal where Julot was. He said, 'In the building just over the way. You want me to tell him something?'

'Yes. Tell him Papillon and Dega are here: ask him to show himself at the window.'

The attendant could come and go as he liked. All he had to do was to knock at the ward door and an Arab would open it. The Arab was a turnkey, a convict acting as an auxiliary to the warders. There were chairs on the right and the left of the door, and three warders sat there, rifles on their knees. The bars over the windows were lengths of railway line: I wondered how one could ever get through them. I sat there at the window.

Between our building and Julot's there was a garden full of pretty flowers. Julot appeared at a window: he had a slate in his hand, and he had chalked BRAVO on it. An hour later the attendant brought me a letter from him. It said, 'I'm trying to get into your ward. If I fail, try to get into mine. The reason is you've got enemies in your ward. So it seems you're interned? Keep your heart up: we'll do them in the eye yet.'

Julot and I were very close to one another because of that business at Beaulieu, where we had suffered together. Julot specialized in the use of a wooden mallet, and that was why they called him the hammerman. He would drive up to a jeweller's shop in the middle of the day, when all the finest jewels were on show in their cases. Someone else would be at the wheel, and they'd pull up with the engine running. Julot hopped out with his mallet, smashed the window with one blow, grabbed as many jewel-cases as he could hold and darted back into the car, which shot away with a scream of tyres. He brought it off in Lyons, Angers, Tours and Le Havre, and then he had a go at a big Paris shop, at three in the afternoon, getting away with jewels to the value of close on a million. He never told me how or why he was identified. He was sentenced to twenty years and he escaped at the end of four. And as he told us, it was in coming back to Paris that he was arrested: he was looking for his fence, so as to kill him, for the fence had never given Julot's sister the large sum he owed him. The fence saw him prowling in the street where he lived and tipped off the police. Julot was picked up and he went back to Guiana with us.

It was a week now that we had been in hospital. Yesterday I gave Chatal two hundred francs: that was the weekly price for keeping both of us. By way of making ourselves popular we gave tobacco to the people who had nothing to smoke. A sixty-year-old tough guy from Marseilles, one Carora, had made friends with Dega. He was his adviser. Many times a day he told him that if he had plenty of money and it was known in the village (the French papers gave the news about all the important cases), then it was much better for him not to escape, because the freed convicts would kill him for his charger. Old Dega told me about his conversations with old Carora. It was in vain that I said the antique was certainly no sort of use, since he had stayed here for twenty years: he paid no attention. The old man's tales made a great impression on Dega, and although I kept his courage up as well as I could it was heavy going.

I sent a note to Sierra asking him to let me see Galgani. It didn't take long. Galgani was in hospital the next day, but in an unbarred ward. How was I to set about giving him back his charger? I told Chatal it was absolutely necessary for me to talk to Galgani: I let him imagine we were preparing a break. He told me he could bring him at five to twelve on the nose. Just as the guard was being changed he would bring him up on to the verandah to talk to me through the window; and he'd do it for nothing. Galgani was brought to me at the window at noon: straight away I put his charger into his hands. He stood there before me and wept. Two days later I had a magazine from him with five thousand-franc notes in it and the single word, Thanks.

Chatal passed me the magazine; and he had seen the money. He did not mention it, but I wanted to give him some: he would not take it. I said, 'We want to get out. Would you like to come with us?'

'No, Papillon, I'm fixed elsewhere. I don't want to try to escape for five months, when my mate will be free. The break will be better prepared that way, and it'll be more certain. Being down for internment, I know you're in a hurry: but getting out of here, with all these bars, is going to be very difficult. Don't count on me to help you - I don't want to risk my job. Here I can wait in peace until my friend comes out.'

'OK, Chatal. It's better to speak straight. I won't ever talk to you about this again.'

'But still,' he said, 'I'll carry notes for you and deliver messages.'

'Thanks, Chatal.'

That night we heard bursts of machine-gun fire. Next day we heard it was the hammer-man who had got away. God be with him: he was a good friend. He must have seen a chance and made the most of it. So much the better for him.

Fifteen years later, in 1948, I was in Haïti, and there, together with a Venezuelan millionaire, I was working out a deal with the chief of the casino for a contract to run the gambling in those parts. One night I came out of a club where we had been drinking champagne, and one of the girls who was with us – coal-black, but as well brought up as the daughter of a good French provincial family – said to me, 'My grandmother's a voodoo priestess, and she lives with an old Frenchman. He escaped from Cayenne. He's been with us now for fifteen years, and he's almost always drunk. Jules Marteau is his name.'

I sobered up instantly. 'Chick, you take me to your grandma's right away.'

She spoke to the cab-driver in Haïtian patois and he drove off at full speed. We passed a night-bar, still open and all lit up. 'Stop.' I went in, bought a bottle of Pernod, two of champagne and two of local rum. 'Let's go.' We reached a pretty little red tiled white house on the beach. The sea almost lapped its steps. The girl knocked and knocked, and first there came out a big black woman with completely white hair. She was wearing a wrapper that came down to her ankles. The two women spoke in patois and then she said, 'Come in, Monsieur: the house is all yours.' An acetylene lamp lit up a very clean room, filled with birds and fishes. 'Would you like to see Julot? He's just coming. Jules! Jules! Here's someone who wants to see you.'

An old man appeared, barefoot and wearing striped blue pyjamas that reminded me of our prison uniform. 'Why, Snowball, who can be coming to see me at this time of night? Papillon! No! It can't be true!' He clasped me in his arms. He said, 'Bring the lamp closer, Snowball, so that I can see my old friend's face. It's you all right, mate! It's certainly you! Welcome, welcome, welcome! This kip, what little dough I've got, and my old woman's grand-daughter – they're all yours. You only have to say the word.'

We drank the Pernod, the champagne and the rum; and from time to time Julot sang. 'So we did them in the eye after all, didn't we, Papi? There's nothing like bashing around. Take me, I came through Colombia, Panama, Costa Rica and Jamaica; and then, about fifteen years ago now, I reached here; and I'm happy with Snowball – she's the best woman a man could ask for. When are you leaving? Are you here for long?'

'No. A week.'

'What did you come for?'

'To take over the casino, with a contract between us and the president himself.'

'Brother, I'd love you to spend the rest of your life here with me in this bleeding wilderness; but if it's the president you're in touch with, don't you fix any sort of deal at all. He'll have you killed the minute he sees your joint is making a go of it.'

'Thanks for the advice.'

'Hey there, Snowball! Get ready for your not-for-tourists voodoo dance. The one and only genuine article for my friend.' Another time I'll tell you about this terrific not-for-tourists voodoo dance.

So Julot escaped, and here were we, Dega, Fernandez and me, still hanging about. Now and then, without seeming to, I looked at the bars over the windows. They were lengths of genuine railway line and there was nothing to be done about them. The only possibility was the door. It was guarded night and day by three armed warders. Since Julot's escape the watch had been much sharper. The patrols came round at shorter intervals and the doctor was not so friendly. Chatal only came into the ward twice a day, to give the injections and to take the temperatures. A second week went by and once more I paid two hundred francs. Dega talked about everything except escape. Yesterday he saw my scalpel and he said, 'You've still got that? What for?'

Angrily I replied, 'To look after myself, and you too if necessary.'

Fernandez was not a Spaniard: he was an Argentine. He was a fine sort of a man, a genuine high-flier; but old Carora's crap had left its mark on him too. One day I heard him say to Dega, 'It seems the islands are very healthy, not like here: and it's not hot over there. You can catch dysentery in this ward just going to the lavatory, because you may pick up gernis.' In this ward of seventy men, one or two died of dysentery every day. It was an odd thing, but they all died at low tide in the afternoon or the evening. No sick man ever died in the morning. Why? One of nature's mysteries.

Tonight I had an argument with Dega. I told him that sometimes the Arab turnkey was stupid enough to come in at night and pull the sheet off the faces of the very sick men who had covered themselves up. We could knock him out and put on his clothes (we wore shirt and sandals - that was all). Once dressed I'd go out, suddenly snatch a rifle from one of the screws, cover them, make them go into a cell and close the door. Then we'd jump the hospital wall on the Maroni side, drop into the water and let ourselves go with the current. After that we'd make up our minds what to do next. Since we had money, we could buy a boat and provisions to get away by sea. Both of them turned my plan down flat, and they even criticized it. I felt they'd quite lost their guts: I was bitterly disappointed: and the days dropped by.

Now it was three weeks all but two days we had been here. There were ten left to try making a dash for it, or fifteen at the most. Today, 21 November 1933, a day not to be forgotten, Joanes Clousiot came into the ward - the man they had tried to murder at Saint-Martin, in the barber's. His eyes were closed and almost sightless: they were full of pus. As soon as Chatal had gone I went over to him. Quickly he told me that the other men for internment had gone off to the islands more than a fortnight ago, but he had been overlooked. Three days back a clerk had given him the word. He had put a castor-oil seed in each eye, and all this pus had got him into hospital. He was dead keen to escape. He told me he was ready for anything, even killing if need be: he would get out, come what may. He had three thousand francs. When his eyes were washed with warm water he could see properly right away. I told him my plan for a break: he liked it, but he said that to catch the warders by surprise two of us would have to go out, or if possible three. We could undo the legs of the beds, and with an iron bed-leg apiece, we could knock them cold. According to him they wouldn't believe you would fire even if you had a gun in your hands, and they might call the other screws on guard in the building Julot escaped from, not twenty yards away.

First Break

Escape from the Hospital

That evening I put it to Dega straight, and then to Fernandez. Dega told me he did not believe in the plan and that he was thinking of paying a large sum of money, if necessary, to have his internment label changed. He asked me to write to Sierra, telling him this had been suggested, and asking whether it was on the cards. Chatal carried the note that same day, and brought back the answer. 'Don't pay anyone anything for having your internment changed. It's decided in France, and no one, even the governor, can touch it. If things are hopeless in the hospital, you can try to get out the day after the Mana, the boat for the islands, has left.'

We should stay a week in the cellular block before going across to the islands where it might be easier to escape than from the hospital ward we had landed up in. In the same note Sierra told me that if I liked he'd send a freed convict to talk about getting me a boat ready behind the hospital. He was a character from Toulon called Jesus: the one who prepared Dr. Bougrat's escape two years before. To see him I should have to go and be X-rayed in the special wing. It was inside the hospital walls, but the freed men could get in on a forged pass for an X-ray examination. He told me to take out my charger before I was looked at, or the doctor might look lower than my lungs and catch sight of it. I wrote to Sierra telling him to get Jesus to the X-ray and to fix things with Chatal so that I should be sent too. That very evening Sierra let me know that it was for nine o'clock the day after next.

The next day Dega asked permission to leave hospital, and so did Fernandez. The Mana had left that morning. They hoped to escape from the cells in the camp: I wished them good luck, but as for me I did not change my plan.

I saw Jesus. He was an old time-expired convict, as dry as smoked haddock, and his sunburnt face was scarred with two hideous wounds. One of his eyes wept all the time when he looked at you. A wrong 'un's face: a wrong 'un's eye. I didn't have much confidence in him and as things turned out I was dead right. We talked fast. 'I can get a boat ready for you: it'll hold four – five at the outside. A barrel of water, victuals, coffee, tobacco; three paddles, empty flour sacks and a needle and thread for you to make the mainsail and jib yourself; a compass, an axe, a knife, five bottles of tafia [the local rum]. Two thousand five hundred francs the lot. It's the dark of the moon in three days. If it's a deal, in four days time I'll be there in the boat on the river every night for a week from eleven till three in the morning. After the first quarter i shan't wait any longer. The boat will be exactly opposite the lower corner of the hospital wall. Guide yourself by the wall, because until you're right on top of the boat you won't be able to see it, not even at two yards.' I didn't trust him, but even so I said yes.

'And the cash?' said Jesus.

'I'll send it you by Sierra.' We parted without shaking hands. Not so hot.

At three o'clock Chatal went off to the camp, taking the money to Sierra: two thousand five hundred francs. I thought: 'I can afford this bet thanks to Galgani; but it's an outside chance, all right. I hope to God he doesn't drink the whole bleeding lot in tafia.'

Clousiot was overjoyed: he was full of confidence in himself, in me and in the plan. There was only one thing that worried him: although the Arab turnkey did come very often it was not every night that he came into the ward itself; and when he did it was rare that he came in very late. Another question: who could we have as a third? There was a Corsican belonging to the Nice underworld, a man called Biaggi. He had been in penal since 1929 and he was in this high-security ward because he had recently killed a guy – he was being held while that charge was investigated. Clousiot and I wondered whether we ought to put it up to him, and if so, when. While we were talking about this in an undertone an eighteen-year-old fairy came towards us, as pretty as a girl. Maturette was his name, and he had been condemned to death but reprieved because of his youth – seventeen when he murdered this taxi-driver. There were these two kids of sixteen and seventeen in the dock at the assizes, and instead of the one laying the blame on the other, each claimed that he had killed the man. But the taxi-driver had only one bullet in him. The kids' attitude at the time of the trial had won them the convicts' esteem.

Very much the young lady, Maturette came up to us and speaking in a girlish voice he asked us for a light. We gave him one; and more than that, I made him a present of four cigarettes and a box of matches. He thanked me with a languishing, come-on smile and we let him go. All at once Clousiot said, 'Papi, we're saved. The Arab's going to come in as often as we like and when we like. It's in the bag.'

'How come?'

'It's simple. We'll tell this little Maturette to make the Arab fall for him. Arabs love boys - everyone knows that. Once that's done, there's no great difficulty in getting him to come by night to have a swig at the boy. All the kid has to do is to go coy and say he's afraid of being seen, for the Arab to come just when it suits us.'

'Leave it to me.'

I went over to Maturette, who welcomed me with a winning smile. He thought he had aroused me with his first simper. Straight away I said, 'You've got it wrong. Go to the lavatory.' He went, and when we were there I said, 'If you repeat a word of what I'm going to say, I'll kill you. Listen: will you do so-and-so and so-and-so and so-and-so for money? How much? As a paid job for us, or do you want to go with us?'

'I'd like to go with you. OK?' Done. We shook hands.

He went to bed, and after a few words with Clousiot I went too. At eight o'clock that evening Maturette went and sat at the window. He didn't have to call the Arab: he came all by himself, and they fell into a murmured conversation. At ten Maturette went to bed. We had been lying down, one eye open, since nine. The Arab came in, went his rounds and found a dead man. He knocked on the door and a little while later two stretcher-bearers came and took the corpse away. This dead man was going to be useful to us, because he would make the Arab's inspections at any time of the night seem quite reasonable. The next day, advised by us, Maturette fixed to see the Arab at eleven. When the time came round the turnkey appeared, passed in front of the kid's bed, pulled his foot to wake him up, and went off towards the lavatory. Maturette followed him. A quarter of an hour later the turnkey came out, went straight to the door and out through it. Just after that Maturette returned to his bed without speaking to us. To cut it short, the next day was the same, only at midnight. Everything was set up: the Arab would come exactly when the kid said.

On 27 November 1933 there were two bed-legs ready to be removed and used as clubs, and at four o'clock in the afternoon I was waiting for a note from Sierra. Chatal, the attendant, appeared: he had nothing in writing: he just said to me, 'François Sierra told me to say Jesus is waiting for you at the place you know. Good luck.'

At eight that night Maturette said to the Arab, 'Come after midnight, because that way we can stay longer together.'

The Arab said he'd come after midnight. Dead on midnight we were ready. The Arab came in at about a quarter past twelve; he went straight to Maturette's bed, tweaked his foot and went on to the lavatory. Maturette went in after him. I wrenched the leg off my bed: it made a little noise as it lurched over. No sound from Clousiot's. I was to stand behind the lavatory door and Clousiot was to walk towards it to attract the Arab's attention. There was a twenty-minutes' wait and then everything moved very fast. The Arab came out of the lavatory and, surprised at seeing Clousiot, said, 'What are you doing here in the middle of the ward at this time of night? Get back to bed.'

At that moment I hit him on the back of the neck and he dropped without a sound. Quickly I put on his clothes and shoes: we dragged him under a bed, and before shoving him completely out of sight I gave him another crack on the nape. That put paid to him.

Not a single one of the eighty men in the ward had stirred. I went quickly towards the door, followed by Clousiot and Maturette, both of them in their shirts. I knocked. The warder opened. I brought my iron down on his head. The other, opposite him, dropped his rifle: he'd certainly been asleep. Before he could move I knocked him out. My two never uttered: Clousiot's went 'Ah!' before he dropped. My two stayed there in their chairs, stunned. The third was stretched out on the floor. We held our breath. It seemed to us that everybody must have heard that 'Ah!' It had indeed been pretty loud; and yet nobody moved.

We didn't heave them into the ward: we went straight with the three rifles. Clousiot first, then the kid, then n down the stairs, half-lit by a lantern. Clousiot had dropped iron: I still had mine in my left hand, and in my right the ri

At the bottom of the stairs, nothing. Ink-black night all round us. We had to look hard to make out the wall over on the river side. We hurried towards it. Once we were there, I bent down. Clousiot climbed up, straddled the top, hauled Maturette up and then me. We let ourselves drop into the darkness on the far side. Clousiot fell badly into a hole, twisting his foot. Maturette and I landed properly. We two got up: we had left the rifles before we went over. Clousiot tried to get to his feet but couldn't: he said his leg was broken. I left Maturette with Clousiot and ran towards the corner of the wall, feeling it all the way with my hand. It was so dark that when I got to the end of the wall I didn't know it, and with my hand reaching out into emptiness I fell flat on my face. Over on the river side I heard a voice saying, 'Is that you?'

'Yes. That Jesus?'

'Yes.' He flicked a match for half a second. I fixed his position, plunged in and swam to him. There were two of them in the boat.

'You in first. Which are you?'

'Papillon.'

'Good.'

'Jesus, we must pull upstream. My friend's broken his leg jumping off the wall.'

'Take this paddle, then, and shove.'

The three paddles dug into the water and the light boat shot across the hundred yards between us and the place where I supposed the others were - you could see nothing. I called, 'Clousiot!'

'For Christ's sake shut up! Fatgut, flick your lighter.' Sparks flashed: they saw it. Clousiot whistled between his teeth the way they do in Lyons; it's a whistle that makes no noise at all but that you hear very clearly. You'd say it was a snake hissing. He kept up this whistling all the time, and it led us to him. Fatgut got out, took Clousiot in his arms and put him into the boat. Then Maturette got in and then Fatgut. There were five of us and the water came to within two inches of the gunwale.

'Don't anyone move without saying,' said Jesus. 'Papillon, stop paddling. Put the paddle across your knees. Fatgut, shove!' And quickly, helped by the current, the boat plunged into the night.

Half a mile lower down, when we passed the prison, ill-lit by the current from a third-rate dynamo, we were in the middle of the river and the tide was tearing us along at an unbelievable rate. Fatgut had stopped paddling. Only Jesus had his out, with its handle tight against his thigh, just to keep the boat steady. He was not rowing at all, only steering.

Jesus said, 'Now we can talk and have a smoke. I think we've brought it off. Are you certain you didn't kill anyone?'

'I don't think so.'

'Christ, Jesus, you've double-crossed me!' said Fatgut. 'You told me it was a harmless little break and no fuss, and now it turns out to be an internees' break, from what I can gather.'

'Yes, they're internees. I didn't feel like telling you, Fatgut, or you wouldn't have helped me: and I needed someone. But why should you worry? If we're shopped I'll take it all on myself.'

'That's the right way of looking at it, Jesus. I don't want to risk my head for the hundred francs you've paid me; nor a lifer if there's anyone wounded.'

I said, 'Fatgut, I'll give you a present of a thousand francs between you.'

'OK, then, brother. That sounds like a square deal to me. Thanks, because we starve to death there in the village. It's worse being outside than in. If you're in, at least you can fill your belly every day; and they find you in clothes.'

'It doesn't hurt you too much, mate?' said Jesus to Clousiot.

'It's all right,' said Clousiot. 'But what are we going to do, Papillon, with my leg broken?'

'We'll see. Where we going, Jesus?'

'I'm going to hide you in a creek twenty miles from the mouth of the river. There you can lie up for a week and let the worst of the warders' and trackers' hunt blow over. You must give them the idea you went right down the Maroni and out to sea this very night. The trackers go in boats with no motor, and they're the most dangerous. If they're on the watch, it can be fatal to you to talk or cough or have a fire. As for the screws, they're in motor-boats that are too big to go up the creeks - they'd run aground.'

The darkness was lessening. For a long time we searched for a landmark known only to Jesus, and it was almost four o'clock before we found it: then we literally went right into the bush. The boat flattened the small undergrowth, which straightened up again behind us, making a very thick protective curtain. You had to be a wizard to know whether there was enough water to float a boat. We went in, pushing aside the branches that barred our passage and thrusting into the bush for more than an hour. All at once we were there, in a kind of canal, and we stopped. There was clean grass on the bank; and now, at six o'clock, the light did not penetrate the leaves of the huge trees. Beneath this impressive roof there were the sounds of hundreds of creatures quite unknown to us. Jesus said, 'Here is where you have to wait for a week. I'll come on the seventh day and bring you food.' From under the thick vegetation he pulled a very small canoe, about six feet long. Two paddles in it. This was the craft he was going back to Saint-Laurent in, on the flood-tide.

Now we took care of Clousiot, who was lying there on the bank. He was still in his shirt, so his legs were bare. We trimmed dry branches with the axe, making splints of them. Fatgut heaved on his foot; Clousiot sweated hard and then at a given moment he cried, 'Stop! It hurts less in this position, so the bone must be in its right place.' We put on the splints and tied them with new hemp cord from the boat. His pain was eased. Jesus had bought four pairs of trousers, four shirts and four relégués woollen lumber-jackets. Maturette and Clousiot put them on: I stayed in the Arab's clothes. We had a tot of rum. This was the second bottle since we left - it warmed us, which was a good thing. The mosquitoes did not give us a moment's peace: we had to sacrifice a packet of tobacco. We put it to soak in a calabash and smeared the nicotine-juice over our faces, hands and feet. The woollen jackets were splendid; they kept us warm in spite of this penetrating damp.

Fatgut said, 'We're off. What about this thousand francs you promised?' I went behind a bush and came back with a brand-new thousand note.

'Be seeing you. Don't stir from here for eight days,' said Jesus. 'We'll come on the seventh. The eighth you can get out to sea. Meanwhile make the mainsail and jib; put the boat to rights, everything in its place. Fix the pintle - the rudder's not shipped. If we don't come within ten days, it means we've been arrested in the village. As there was an attack on a warder, which adds some spice to the break, there will surely be the most God-almighty bleeding rampage about it all.'

Clousiot had told us he didn't leave the rifle at the bottom of the wall. He had flung it over, and the water was so close

(which he hadn't known) that it must certainly have gone into the river. Jesus said that was fine, because if it was not found the trackers were going to think we were armed. And since they were the really dangerous ones, we should therefore have nothing to be afraid of. Because they only had a revolver and a jungle-knife and if they thought we had rifles, they would never risk it.

Good-bye. Good-bye. If we were found and we had to leave the boat, we should go up the little stream as far as the dry bush and then steer by compass, always keeping north. In two or three days' march we were likely to come across the death-camp called Charvin. There we should have to pay someone to tell Jesus we were in such and such a place. The two old lags pushed off. A few moments later their canoe had vanished: we neither heard nor saw anything more at all.

Daylight comes into the bush in a very special way. You would think you were in an arcade whose top caught the sun and never let a single ray make its way down to the bottom. It began to grow hot. And now here we were, Maturette, Clousiot and me, quite alone. Our first reaction was to laugh – the whole thing had run on oiled wheels. The only hitch was Clousiot's broken leg, though he said himself that now it was held between flat pieces of wood, it was all right. We could brew the coffee straight away. This we did very quickly, making a fire and drinking a great mug of black coffee apiece, sweetened with brown sugar. It was marvellous. We had used ourselves up so much since the evening before that we hadn't the energy to look at the things or to inspect the boat. We'd see to all that later. We were free, free, free. Exactly thirty-seven days had passed since I reached Guiana. If we brought this break off, my lifer wouldn't have been a very long one. I said aloud, 'Monsieur le Président, how many years does penal servitude for life last in France?' and I burst out laughing. So did Maturette – he had a lifer too. Clousiot said, 'Don't crow too soon. Colombia's a long way off, and this hollowed-out tree-trunk doesn't seem to me much of a thing to go to sea in.'

I did not reply, because to tell the truth until the last moment I had thought it was just the canoe meant to take us to the real boat, the boat for the sea voyage. When I found I was wrong, I did not like to say anything, so as not to discourage my friends in the first place, and in the second not to give Jesus the idea that I didn't know what kind of boats were usually used for a break – he seemed to think it perfectly natural.

We spent the first day talking and getting to know a little about the bush – it was completely strange to us. Monkeys and squirrels of some kind flung themselves about overhead in the most astonishing way. A herd of peccaries came down to drink: they are a kind of small wild pig. There were at least two thousand of them. They plunged into the creek and swam about, tearing off the hanging roots. An alligator emerged from God knows where and caught one pig by the foot: it started to shriek and squeal like a steam-engine, and all the others rushed at the alligator, clambering on to it and trying to bite the corners of its enormous mouth. At every blow of the alligator's tail a pig flew into the air, one to the left, the next to the right. One pig was stunned and it floated there, belly up. Instantly its companions ate it. The creek was red with blood. This scene lasted twenty minutes and then the alligator escaped into the water. We never saw it again.

We slept well, and in the morning we made our coffee. I took off my jacket so as to wash with a big bar of common soap we found in the boat. Using my scalpel, Maturette shaved me, more or less, and then he shaved Clousiot. He himself had no beard. When I picked up my jacket to put it on again, a huge, hairy, blackish-purple spider fell out. Its hairs were very long and each ended in a little shining ball. The monstrous thing must have weighed at least a pound: I squashed it, feeling disgusted. We took everything out of the boat, including the little water-barrel. The water was violet, and it seemed to me Jesus had put in too much permanganate to make it keep. There were well-corked bottles with matches and strikers. The compass was only a schoolboy's job – it just gave north, south, east and west: no graduations. The mast was no more than eight feet long, so we sewed the flour-sacks into a lug-sail with a border of rope to strengthen it. And I made a little triangular jib to help make the boat lie close.

When we stepped the mast I found the boat's bottom was not sound: the slot for the mast was eaten away and badly worn. When I put in the spikes for the hinges that were to hold the rudder, they went in as if the hull were butter. The boat was rotten. That sod Jesus was sending us to our death. Very unwittingly I explained all this to the others: I had no right to hide it from them. What were we going to do about it? Make Jesus find us a sounder boat when he came, that's what. We'd take his weapons from him, and carrying a knife and the axe I'd go to the village with him and look for another boat. It was a great risk to take; but not so great as putting to sea in a coffin. The stores were all right: there was a wicker-covered bottle of oil and some tins full of manioc flour. We could go a long way on that.

That morning we saw a wonderfully strange sight: a troop of grey-faced monkeys had a battle with monkeys whose faces were black and woolly. During the struggle Maturette came in for a piece of wood on the head that gave him a lump the size of a walnut.

Now we had been there five days and four nights. Last night rain fell in torrents. We sheltered ourselves under wild banana leaves. Their shiny sides poured with water, but we were not wetted at all, only our feet. This morning, as we drank our coffee, I thought about Jesus's wickedness. Taking advantage of our lack of experience to palm off this rotting boat on us! Just to save five hundred or a thousand francs he was sending three men to certain death. I wondered whether I shouldn't kill him once I had forced him to get us another boat.

Suddenly we were startled by a noise like jays, a shrieking so harsh and unpleasant that I told Maturette to take the jungle-knife and go and see what was up. Five minutes later he came back, beckoning. I followed him and we reached a spot about a hundred and fifty yards from the boat: hanging there I saw a great pheasant or wild-fowl, twice the size of a cock. It was caught in a noose and it was hanging by its foot from a branch. With one blow of the jungle-knife I took off its head, to stop its ghastly shrieks. I felt its weight: it must have been at least ten pounds. It had spurs like a cock. We decided to eat it, but while we were thinking it over, it occurred to us that somebody must have set that snare and that there might be others. We went to have a look. When we were back there we found something very odd – a positive fence or wall about a foot high, made of woven leaves and creepers, some ten yards from the creek. This barrier ran parallel with the water. Every now and then there was a gap, and in this gap, hidden by twigs, the end of a noose of brass wire fixed to a bent-over whippy branch. I saw at once that the creature must come up against this hedge and then go along it, trying to get past. On finding the gap, it would pass through, but its feet would catch in the wire and spring the branch. Then there it would be, hanging in the air until the owner of the snares came to take it.

This discovery worried us badly. The hedge seemed to be well kept, so it wasn't old; and we were in danger of being found. We mustn't light a fire in the daytime: but at night the hunter wouldn't come. We decided to take it in turns to keep watch in the direction of the traps. We hid the boat under branches and all the stores in the bush.

The next day at ten o'clock I was on guard. For supper we had eaten that pheasant or cock or whatever it was. The soup had done us an enormous amount of good, and although the meat was only boiled it was still delicious. We had each eaten two bowls full. So I was on guard: but I was so taken up with the goings-on of the huge black manioc ants, each carrying a piece of leaf to the enormous ant-hill, that I forgot to keep watch. These ants were close on an inch long and they stood high on their legs. Each one was carrying this enormous piece of leaf. I followed them to the plant they were stripping and I discovered the whole thing was thoroughly organized. First there were the cutters, who did nothing but get the pieces ready: they were working away on a gigantic leaf something like the ones on a banana palm, very skilfully and very quickly cutting off pieces all the same size, which they dropped to the ground. Down below there were ants of the same sort but slightly different. These ones had a grey stripe on the side of their jaws: and they stood in a half circle, supervising the carriers. The carriers came filing in from the right and they went off towards the left in the direction of the ant-hill. They snatched up their loads before getting into line, but sometimes, what with their hurry in trying to load and to get into position, there was a jam. Then the police-ants would step in and shove the workers into their proper places. I couldn't understand the crime one worker had committed, but she was brought out of the ranks and one police-ant bit off her head while another divided her body in two in the middle. The police-ants stopped two workers; they put down their loads, scratched a hole, buried the three parts of the ant - head, chest, bottom piece - and covered them over with earth.

Pigeon Island

I was so taken up with watching these creatures and following the soldiers to see whether their policing went as far as the entrance to the ant-hill, that I was taken utterly by surprise when a voice said, 'Don't move or you're a dead man, Turn round.'

It was a man bare from the waist up, wearing khaki shorts and long red leather boots. He had a double-barrelled gun in his hands. Medium-sized and thickset: sunburnt. He was bald and his eyes and nose were covered with a bright blue tattooed mask. And in the middle of his forehead there was a tattooed black-beetle.

'You armed?'

'No.'

'Alone?'

'No.'

'How many of you are there?'

'Three.'

'Take me to your friends.'

'I wouldn't like to do that: one has a rifle, and I wouldn't like to get you killed before I know what you mean to do.'

'Ah? Don't you move an inch, then; and just you talk quiet, You're the three guys that escaped from the hospital?'

'Yes.'

'Which is Papillon?'

'That's me.'

'Well then, I can tell you you've stirred things up good and proper in the village, with your escape! Half the time-expired men are under arrest at the gendarmerie.' He came towards me, and lowering his gun he stretched out his hand. 'I'm the Masked Breton,' he said. 'You've heard of me?'

'No, but I can see you're not a tracker.'

'You're right there. I set traps round about here to catch hoccos. A jaguar must have eaten one for me, unless it was you guys.'

'It was us.'

'You want some coffee?' He had a thermos in a knapsack: he gave me a little and drank some himself. I said, 'Come and see my friends.' He came and sat down with us. He was amuse at my having pulled the rifle trick with him. He said, 'I fell for it, particularly as everyone knows you left carrying a gun, and there's no tracker who'll go after you.'

He told us he had been in Guiana twenty years and that he'd been free these last five. He was forty-five. Because of the silly caper of having had that mask tattooed on his face, life in France didn't mean anything to him. He worshipped the bush and lived off it entirely - snakes' and jaguars' skins, butterfly collections, and above all catching live hoccos, the bird we'd eaten. He could sell them for two hundred or two hundred and fifty francs. I suggested paying for it, but he refused indignantly. This is what he told us: 'The bird is a sort of wild bush cock. Of course, it's never so much as seen an ordinary hen or a cock or a human being. Well, I catch one, I take it to the village and I sell it to someone who has a hen-run - they're always in demand. Right. You don't have to clip his wings, you don't have to do anything at all: at nightfall you put him into the henhouse and when you open the door in the morning there he is, standing by, looking like he was counting the cocks and hens as they come out. He comes out after them, and although he eats alongside of them, all the time he's watching - he looks up, he looks sideways and he looks into the bushes all round. There's no watchdog to touch him. In the evening he stands there at the door and although no one can tell how, he knows if there's a hen or two missing, and he goes and finds them. And whether it's a cock or whether it's a hen, he drives them in, pecking them like mad to teach them to keep an eye on the clock. He kills rats, snakes, shrews, spiders and centipedes; and a bird of prey has hardly appeared in the sky before he sends everyone off to hide in the grass while he stands there defying it. He never quits the hen-run for a moment.' And this was the wonderful bird we had eaten like any common barnyard cock.

The Masked Breton told us that Jesus, Fatgut and some thirty other freed men were in prison in the Saint-Laurent gendarmerie, being investigated to see whether any of them could be recognized as having been seen prowling about the building we escaped from. The Arab was in the black-hole of the gendarmerie. He was in solitary, accused of having helped us. The two blows that knocked him out had left no mark, whereas each of the screws had a little lump on the head. 'For my part, I wasn't interfered with at all, because everybody knows I never have anything to do with preparing a break.' He told us Jesus was a sod. When I spoke to him about the boat he asked to see it. He'd scarcely caught sight of it before he cried, 'But the bastard was sending you to your death! This canoe could never live for an hour in the sea. The first wave of any size, and it'd split in two as it came down. Don't go off in that thing - it'd be suicide.'

'What can we do, then?'

'Got any money?'

'Yes.'

'Then I'll tell you what to do: and what's more, I'll help you. You deserve it. You mustn't go anywhere near the village - not at any price. To get hold of a decent boat you have to go to Pigeon Island. There are about two hundred lepers there. There's no warder, and no healthy man ever goes, not even the doctor. At eight o'clock every day a boat takes food for twenty-four hours: uncooked food. A hospital orderly hands over a case of medicine to the two attendants, lepers themselves, who look after the patients. No one sets foot on the island, whether he's warder, tracker or priest. The lepers live in little straw huts they make themselves. They have a central building where they meet. They raise hens and ducks, and that helps them out with their rations. Officially they aren't allowed to sell anything off the island, so they have an illicit trade with Saint-Laurent, Saint-Jean and the Chinese of Albina in Dutch Guiana. They're all dangerous murderers. They don't often kill one another but they do a fair amount of villainy when they get out of the island on the quiet - they go back and hide there when it's over. They have some boats stolen from the nearby village for these excursions. Possessing a boat is the worst crime they can commit. The warders fire on any canoe that comes or goes from Pigeon Island. So the lepers sink their boats, filling them with stones: when they need one they dive down, take out the stones, and the boat comes up. There are all kinds on the island, every colour and nation and from every part of France. What it comes to is this - your canoe is only any use to you on the Maroni, and without much in it, at that. To get out to sea, you've got to find another boat, and the best place for that is Pigeon Island.'

'How are we to set about it?'

'This is how. I'll come with you up the river until we're in sight of the island. You wouldn't find it, or at any rate you might go wrong. It's about a hundred miles from the mouth, so you have to go upstream again. It's about thirty miles from Saint-Laurent. I'll guide you in as close as I can and then I'll get into my canoe - we'll tow it behind. Then, once on the island, it's all up to you.'

'Why won't you come on to the island with us?'

'Ma Doué,' said the Breton, 'I just set foot on the landing stage one day, the jetty where the official boats come in. Just once. It was in full daylight, but even so, what I saw was quite enough for me. No, Papi: I'll never set foot on that island again in my life. Anyhow, I'd never be able to hide my disgust at being near them, talking to them, dealing with them. I'd do more harm than good.'

'When do we go?'

'At nightfall.'

'What's the time now, Breton?'

'Three o'clock.'

'OK. I'll get a little sleep.'

'No. You've got to load everything properly aboard your canoe.'

'Nothing of the sort. I'll go with the empty canoe and then come back for Clousiot. He can stay here with the things.'

'Impossible. You'd never be able to find the place again, even in the middle of the day. And you must never, never be on the river in daylight. The search for you isn't over, so don't think that. The river is still very dangerous.'

Evening came. He brought his canoe and we tied it behind ours. Clousiot lay next to the Breton, who took the steering paddle, and then came Maturette, and then me in front. We made our slow way out of the creek and when we came into the river, night was just about to come down. Over towards the sea a huge brownish-red sun lit up the horizon. The countless fireworks of an enormous display fought to be the most brilliant, redder than the red, yellower than the yellow, more fantastically striped where the colours were mixed. Ten miles away, we could distinctly make out the estuary of the splendid river as it ran gleaming pink and silver into the sea.

The Breton said, 'It's the last of the ebb. In an hour we should feel the flood-tide: we'll make use of it to run up the Maroni: the current will take us up without any effort, and we'll reach the island pretty soon.' The darkness came down in a single sweep.

'Give way,' said the Breton. 'Paddle hard and get into the middle of the stream. Don't smoke.' The paddles dug into the water and we moved quite fast across the current. Shoo, shoo, shoo. The Breton and I kept stroke beautifully; Maturette did his best. The nearer we got to the middle of the river the more we felt the thrust of the tide. We slid on rapidly, and every half hour we felt the difference. The tide grew in strength, pushing us faster and faster. Six hours later we were very close to the island and heading straight for it - a great patch of darkness almost in the middle of the river, slightly to the right. 'That's it,' said the Breton in a low voice. The night was not very dark, but it would have been almost impossible to see us from any distance because of the mist over the face of the water. We came closer. When the outline of the rocks was clearer, the Breton got into his canoe and cast off quickly, just murmuring, 'Good luck, you guys.'

'Thanks.'

'Think nothing of it.'

As the boat no longer had the Breton steering it, we went straight for the island, drifting sideways. I tried to straighten out, turning it right round, but I made a mess of it and the current thrust us deep into the vegetation overhanging the water. We came in with such force, in spite of my braking with my paddle, that if we had hit a rock instead of leaves and branches the canoe would have been smashed and everything lost - stores, food, the lot. Maturette jumped into the water and heaved; we slid under a huge clump of bushes. He pulled and pulled and we tied the boat to a branch. We had a shot of rum and then I climbed the bank alone, leaving my two friends in the boat.

I went along with the compass in my hand, breaking several branches as I went, tying on scraps of flour-sack that I had put aside before we left. I saw a lighter patch in the darkness and then all at once I made out three huts and heard the sound of voices. I went forward, and as I had no idea how to make myself known, I decided to let them find me. I lit a cigarette. The moment the match sparked a little dog rushed out, barking and jumping up to bite my legs. 'Christ, I hope it's not a leper,' I thought. 'Don't be a fool: dogs don't get leprosy.'

'Who's there? Who is it? Marcel, is that you?'

'It's a guy on the run.'

'What are you doing here? Trying to knock something off? Do you think we've got anything to spare?'

'No. I want help.'

'For free or for cash?'

'You shut your bloody trap, La Chouette.' Four shadows came out of the hut. 'Come forward slowly, brother. I'll bet any money you're the character with the rifle. If you've got it with you, put it down: there's nothing to be afraid of here.'

'Yes, that's me. But the rifle's not here.' I walked forward; I was close to them; it was dark and I could not make out their faces. Like a fool I held out my hand: nobody took it. Too late I grasped that this was the wrong move here – they didn't want to infect me.

'Let's go into the hut,' said La-Chouette. It was lit by an oil lamp standing on the table. 'Sit down.'

I took a straw chair without a back. La Chouette lit three other lamps and set one on the table just in front of me. The wick gave off a sickening reek – the smell of coconut-oil. I sat there: the five others stood. I couldn't make out their faces. Mine was lit up by the lamp, which was what they had wanted. The voice that had told La Chouette to shut up said, 'L'Anguille, go to the house and ask if they want us to take him there. Come back with the answer quick, particularly if Tous-saint says yes. We can't give you anything to drink here, mate, unless you'd like a raw egg.' He pushed a plaited basket full of eggs towards me.

'No, thanks.'

Very close to me on my right one of them sat down and it was then that I saw my first leper's face. It was horrible and I made an effort not to turn away or show what I felt. His nose, flesh and bone, was entirely eaten away: a hole right in the middle of his face. I mean a hole, not two. Just one hole, as big as a two-franc piece. On the right-hand side his lower lip was eaten away, and three very long yellow teeth showed in the shrunken gum: you could see them go into the naked bone of the upper jaw. Only one ear. He put his bandaged hand on the table. It was his right hand. In the two fingers that he still had on the other he held a long, fat cigar: he must certainly have rolled it himself from a half-cured leaf, for it was greenish. He had an eyelid only on his left eye: the right had none, and a deep wound ran upwards from the eye into his thick grey hair. In a hoarse voice he said, 'We'll help you, mate: you mustn't stay in Guiana long enough to get the way I am. I don't want that.'

'Thanks.'

'They call me Jean sans Peur: I'm from Paris. I was better looking, healthier and stronger than you when I reached the settlement. Ten years, and now look at me.'

'Don't they give you any treatment?'

'Yes, they do. I've been better since I started chaulmoogra oil injections. Look.' He turned his head and showed me the left side. 'It's drying up here.'

I had an overwhelming feeling of pity and to show my friendliness I put my hand up towards his left cheek. He started back and said, 'Thanks for meaning to touch me. But don't ever touch a sick man, and don't eat or drink out of his bowl.' This was still the only leper's face I had seen - the only one who had the courage to bear my looking at him.

'Where's this character you're talking about?' The shadow of a man only just bigger than a dwarf appeared in the doorway. 'Toussaint and the others want to see him. Bring him over.'

Jean sans Peur stood up and said, 'Follow me.' We all went out into the darkness, four or five in front, me next to Jean sans Peur, the rest behind. In three minutes we reached a broad open place, a sort of square, which was lit by a scrap of moon. This was the flat topmost point of the island. A house in the middle. Light coming out of two windows. About twenty men waiting for us in front of the door: we went towards them. As we reached the door they stood aside to let us go through. It was a room some thirty feet long and twelve wide with a log fire burning in a kind of fireplace made of four huge stones all the same height. The place was lit by two big hurricane lamps. An ageless man with a white face sat there on a stool. Five or six others on a bench behind him. He had black eyes and he said to me. 'I'm Toussaint the Corsican: and you must be Papillon.'

'Yes.'

'News travels fast in the settlement; as fast as you move yourself. Where have you put the rifle?'

'We tossed it into the river.'

'Where?'

'Opposite the hospital wall, just where we jumped.'

'So it could be got at?'

'I think so; the water's not deep there.'

'How do you know?'

'We had to get in to carry my wounded friend into the boat.'

'What's wrong with him?'

'A broken leg.'

'What have you done about it?'

'I've split branches down the middle and put a kind of cage round his leg.'

'Does it hurt?'

'Yes.'

'Where is he?'

'In the canoe.'

'You said you'd come for help. What sort of help?'

'A boat.'

'You want us to let you have a boat?'

'Yes. I've got money to pay for it.'

'OK. I'll sell you mine. It's a splendid boat, quite new - I stole it only last week in Albina. Boat? It's not a boat: it's a liner. There's only one thing it lacks, and that's a keel. It hasn't got one: but we'll put one on for you in a couple of hours. There's everything there - a rudder and its tiller, a thirteen-foot iron-wood mast and a brand-new canvas sail. What'll you give me?'

'You name a price. I don't know the value of things here.'

'Three thousand francs, if you can pay it: if not, go and fetch the rifle tomorrow night and we'll do a swap.'

'No. I'd rather pay.'

'OK, it's a deal. La Puce, let's have some coffee.'

La Puce, the near-dwarf who had come for me, went to a plank fixed to the wall over the fire, took down a mess-tin shining with cleanliness and newness, poured coffee into it from a bottle and set it on the fire. After a while he took it off, poured coffee into various mugs standing by the stones for Toussaint to pass to the men behind him, and gave me the mess-tin, saying 'Don't be afraid of drinking. This one's for visitors only. No sick man ever uses it.'

I took the bowl, drank, and then rested it on my knee. As I did so I noticed a finger sticking to its side. I was beginning to grasp the situation when La Puce said, 'Hell, I've lost another finger. Where the devil can it have got to?'

'Here it is,' I said, showing him the tin. He picked off the finger, threw it in the fire and gave me back the bowl.

'It's all right to drink,' he said, 'because I've only got dry leprosy. I come to pieces spare part by spare part, but I don't rot - I'm not catching.'

I smelt burning meat. I thought, 'That must be the finger.'

Toussaint said, 'You'll have to spend the whole day here until the evening ebb. You must go and tell your friends. Carry the one with the broken leg up to a hut, empty the canoe and sink it. There's no one here can give you a hand - you know why, of course.'

I hurried back to the others. We lifted Clousiot out and then carried him to a hut. An hour later everything was out of the canoe and carefully arranged on the ground. La Puce asked for the canoe and a paddle as a present. I gave it to him and he went off to sink it in a place he knew. The night passed quickly. We were all three of us in the hut, lying on new blankets sent by Toussaint. They reached us still wrapped in their strong backing paper. Stretched out there at my ease. I told Clousiot and Maturette the details of what had happened since I went ashore and about the deal I had made with Toussaint. Then, without thinking, Clousiot said a stupid thing. 'So the break's costing six thousand five hundred. I'll give you half, Papillon - I mean the three thousand francs that I have.'

'We don't want to muck about with accounts like a bunch of bank-clerks. So long as I've got the cash, I pay. After that - well, we'll see.'

None of the lepers came into the hut. Day broke, and Toussaint appeared. 'Good morning. You can go out without worrying. No one can come on you unexpectedly here. Up a coconut-palm on the top of the island there's a guy watching to see if there are any screws' boats on the river. There's none in sight. So long as that bit of white cloth is up there, it means no boats. If he sees anything he'll come down and say. You can pick papayas yourselves and eat them, if you like.'

I said, 'Toussaint, what about the keel?'

'We'll make it out of a plank from the infirmary door. That's heavy snake-wood. Two planks will do the job. We took advantage of the night to haul the boat up to the top. Come and have a look.' We went. It was a splendid sixteen-foot boat, quite new, with two thwarts - one had a hole for the mast. It was so heavy that Maturette and I had a job turning it over. The sail and rigging were brand-new. There were rings in the sides to lash things to, such as the water-barrel. We set to work. By noon a keel, deepening as it ran aft, was firmly fixed with long screws and the four spikes I had with me.

Standing there in a ring, the lepers silently watched us work.

Toussaint told us how to set about it and we followed his instructions. Toussaint's face looked natural enough – no bad places on it. But when he spoke you noticed that only one half of his face moved, the left half. He told me that; and he also told me he had dry leprosy. His chest and his right arm were paralysed too, and he was expecting his right leg to go presently. His right eye was as set as one made of glass: it could see, but not move. I won't give any of the lepers' names. Maybe those who knew or loved them were never told the hideous way they rotted alive.

As I worked I talked to Toussaint. No one else said a word. Except once, when I was just going to pick up some hinges they had wrenched off a piece of furniture in the infirmary to strengthen the hold of the keel: one said, 'Don't take them yet. Leave them there. I cut myself getting one off, and although I wiped it there's still a little blood.' Another leper poured rum over the hinge and lit it twice. 'Now you can use it,' he said.

During our work Toussaint said to one of the lepers, 'You've escaped a good many times: tell Papillon just what he ought to do, since none of these three has ever made a break.'

Straight away the leper began, 'The ebb will start very early this afternoon. The tide'll change at three. By nightfall, about six o'clock, you'll have a very strong run that'll take you to about sixty miles from the mouth of the river in less than three hours. When you have to pull in, it'll be about nine. You must tie up good and solid to a tree in the bush during the six hours of flood: that brings you to three in the morning. Don't set off then, though, because the ebb doesn't run fast enough. Get out into the middle at say half past four. You'll have an hour and a half to cover the thirty odd miles before sunrise. Everything depends on that hour and a half. At six o'clock, when the sun comes up, you have to be out at sea. Even if the screws do see you, they can't follow, because they'd reach the bar at the mouth of the river just as the flood begins. They can't get over it, and you'll already be across. You've got to have that lead of half a mile when they see you – it's life or death. There's only one sail here. What did you have on the canoe?'

'Mainsail and jib.'

'This is a heavy boat: it'll stand two jibs – a staysail and an outer jib to keep her bows well up. Go out of the river with everything set. There are always heavy seas at the mouth there, and you want to take them head on. Make your friends lie down in the bottom to keep her steady and get a good grip on the tiller. Don't tie the sheet to your leg, but pass it through that fairlead and hold it with a turn round your wrist. If you see that the wind and a heavy sea are going to lay you right over, let everything go and you'll straighten up right away. If that happens, don't you stop, but let the mainsail spill the wind and carry right on with the jib and staysail full. When you're out in the blue water you'll have time enough to put it all to rights - not before that. Do you know your course?'

'No. All I know is that Venezuela and Colombia lie north-west.'

'That's right; but take care not to be forced back on shore, Dutch Guiana, on the other side of the river, hands escaped men back, and so does British Guiana. Trinidad doesn't, but they make you leave in a fortnight. Venezuela returns you, after you've worked on the roads for a year or two.'

I listened as hard as I could. He told me he went off from time to time, but since he was a leper everybody sent him away at once. He admitted he had never been farther than Georgetown in British Guiana. His leprosy could only be seen on his feet, which had lost all their toes. He was barefoot. Tour-saint told me to repeat all the advice I had been given, and I did so without making a mistake. At this point Jean sans Peur said, 'How long ought he to sail out to sea?'

I answered him, 'He shall sail north-north-east for three days. Reckoning the leeway that'll make dead north. Then the fourth day he'll head north-west, which will come to true west.'

'That's right' said the leper. 'Last time I only lasted out two days, so I ended up in British Guiana. With three days sailing on, you'll go north past Trinidad or Barbados, and then you go right by Venezuela without noticing it and land up in Guaya-cuo or Columbia.'

Jean sans Peur said to Tour-saint, 'What did you sell your toes for?'

'Three thousand' said Tour-saint. 'Was that good?'

'No, that wasn't why I asked. But as I know, that's all you pay, Papillon?'

'Yes.'

'Will you have any money left?'

'No. That's all we've got - exactly the same amount as my friend Clouston had at first.'

'Toussaint,' said Jean sans Peur, 'I'll let you have my revolver. I'd like to help these guys. What'll you give me for it?'

'A thousand francs,' said Toussaint. 'I'd like to help them too.'

'Thanks for everything,' said Maturette, looking at Jean sans Peur.

'Thanks,' said Clousiot.

Now I was ashamed of having lied and I said, 'No. I can't take it. There's no reason why you should give us anything.'

He looked at me and said, 'Yes, there is a reason all right. Three thousand francs is a lot of money; but even so, Toussaint's dropping two thousand at least on the deal, because it's a hell of a good boat he's letting you have. There's no reason why I shouldn't do something for you too.'

And then something very moving happened. La Chouette put a hat on the ground and the lepers began throwing notes or coins into it. Lepers appeared from everywhere, and every one of them put something in. I was overcome with shame. Yet it just wasn't possible to say I still had money left. Christ, what was I to do? Here was this great-hearted conduct and I was behaving like a shit. I said, 'Please, please don't sacrifice all this.' A coal-black Negro, terribly mutilated – two stumps for hands, no fingers at all – said, 'We don't use the money for living. Don't be ashamed to take it. We only use it for gambling or for stuffing the leper-women who come over from Albina now and then.' What he said was a relief to me and it stopped me confessing I still had some money.

The lepers had boiled two hundred eggs. They brought them in a wooden box with a red cross on it. It was the box they had had that morning with the day's medicines. They also brought two live turtles weighing at least half a hundredweight each, carefully laid on their backs, tobacco in leaves and two bottles full of matches and strikers; a sack of at least a hundredweight of rice, two bags of charcoal; the Primus from the infirmary and a wicker bottle of paraffin. The whole community, all these terribly unfortunate men, felt for us; they all wanted to help us succeed. Anyone would have said this, was their escape rather than ours. We hauled the boat down near to the place where we had landed. They counted the money in the hat: eight hundred and ten francs. I only had to give Toussaint one thousand two hundred. Clousiot passed me his charger. I opened it there in front of everybody. It held a thousand-franc note and four five hundreds. I gave Toussaint one thousand five hundred. He gave me three hundred change and then he said, 'Here. Take the revolver - it's a present. You're staking everything you've got, and it mustn't go wrong at the last moment just for want of a weapon. I hope you won't have to use it.'

I didn't know how to say thank you, to Toussaint first and then to all the others. The medical orderly had put up a little tin with cotton-wool, alcohol, aspirin, bandages, iodine, a pair of scissors and some sticking-plaster. Another leper brought two slim, well-planed pieces of wood and two strips of anti-septic binding still in its packet, perfectly new. They were a present so that I could change Clousiot's splints.

About five it began to rain. Jean sans Peur said, 'You're lucky. There's no danger of your being seen, so you can get off right away and gain at least half an hour. That way you'll be nearer the mouth when you start again at half-past four in the morning.'

'How shall I know the time?' I asked him.

'The tide'll tell you, coming in or out.'

We launched the boat. It was not like the canoe at all. Even with us and all our things aboard, the gunwale was a good eighteen inches from the water. The mast, wrapped in the sail, lay flat fore and aft, because we were not to put it up until we were about to run out of the river. We shipped the rudder, with its safety-bar and tiller, and put a pad of creepers for me to sit on. We made a comfortable place in the bottom of the boat with the blankets for Clousiot, who had not wanted to have his bandages changed. He lay at my feet, between me and the water-barrel. Maturette was in the bottom too, but up forward. Straight away I had a feeling of safety and solidity that I had never had in the canoe.

It was still raining. I was to go down the middle of the river, but rather to the left, over on the Dutch side. Jean sans Peur said, 'Good-bye. Push off quick.'

'Good luck,' said Toussaint, and he gave the boat a great shove with his foot.

'Thanks, Toussaint. Thanks, Jean. Thanks, everybody, thanks a thousand times over!' And we vanished at great speed, swept along by the ebb-tide that had begun quite two and a half hours ago and that was now running at an unbelievable pace.

It rained steadily: we couldn't see ten yards in front of us. There were two little islands lower down, so Maturette leant out over the bows, staring ahead so we shouldn't run on their rocks. Night fell. For a moment we were half caught in the branches of a big tree that was going down the river with us, but fortunately not quite so fast. We quickly got free and carried on at something like twenty miles an hour. We smoked: we drank rum. The lepers had given us half a dozen of those straw-covered Chianti bottles, but filled with tafia. It was odd, but not one of us mentioned the hideous mutilations we had seen among the lepers. The only thing we talked about was their kindness, their generosity, their straightness and our good luck in having met the Masked Breton, who took us to Pigeon Island. It rained harder and harder and I was wet through; but those woollen jackets were such good quality they kept you warm even when they were soaked. We were not cold. The only thing was my hand on the tiller – the rain made it go stiff.

'We're running at more than twenty-five miles an hour now,' said Maturette. 'How long do you think we've been gone for?'

'I'll tell you,' said Clousiot. 'Just a moment. Three and a quarter hours.'

'Are you crazy, man? How can you possibly tell?'

'I've been counting ever since we left and at each three hundred seconds I've torn off a piece of cardboard. There're thirty-nine bits now. At five minutes a go, that makes three hours and a quarter. Unless I've got it wrong, in fifteen or twenty minutes we shan't be running down any more, but going back to where we came from.'

I thrust the tiller over to my right to slant across the stream and get into the bank on the Dutch side. Before we reached the shore the current had stopped. We were no longer going down; and we weren't going up, either. It was still raining. We no longer smoked; we no longer talked – we whispered. 'Take the paddle and shove.' I paddled too, holding the tiller wedged under my right leg. Gently we came up against the bush: we seized branches and pulled, sheltering beneath them. We were in the darkness of the vegetation. The river was grey, quite covered with thick mist. If we had not been able to rely upon the ebb and flow of the tides, it would have been impossible to tell where the sea lay and where the landward river.

Right Out and Away

The flood-tide would last six hours. Then there was the hour and a half to wait for the ebb. I should be able to sleep for seven hours, although I was very much on edge. I had to get some sleep, because once out at sea, when should I be able to lie down? I stretched out between the barrel and the mast; Maturette laid a blanket over the thwart and the barrel by way of a cover, and there in the shelter I slept and slept. Dreams, rain, cramped position – nothing disturbed that deep, heavy sleep.

I slept and slept until Maturette woke me. 'Papi, we think it's time, or just about. The ebb has been running a good while.'

The boat had turned towards the sea and under my fingers the current raced by. It was no longer raining, and by the light of a quarter moon we could distinctly see the river a hundred yards in front of us, carrying trees, vegetation and dark shapes upon its surface. I tried to distinguish the exact place where the sea and river met. Where we were lying there was no wind. Was there any out in the middle? Was it strong? We pushed out from under the bush, the boat still hitched to a big root. Looking at the sky I could just make out the coast, where the river ended and the sea began. We had run much farther down than we had thought, and it seemed to me that we were under six miles from the mouth. We had a stiff tot of rum. Should we step the mast now? Yes, said the others. It was up, very strongly held in its heel and the hole in the thwart. I hoisted the sail without unfurling it, keeping it tight to the mast. Maturette was ready to haul up the staysail and jib when I said. All that was needed to fill the sail was to cast loose the line holding it close to the mast, and I'd be able to do that from where I sat. Maturette had one paddle in the bows and I had another in the stern: we should have to shove out very strong and fast, for the current was pressing us tight against the bank.

'Everybody ready. Shove away. In the name of God.'

'In the name of God,' repeated Clousiot.

'Into Thy hands I entrust myself,' said Maturette.

And we shoved. Both together we shoved on the water with our blades – I thrust deep and I pulled hard: so did Maturette. We got under way as easy as kiss my hand. We weren't a stone's throw from the bank before the tide had swept us down a good hundred yards. Suddenly there was the breeze, pushing us out towards the middle.

'Hoist the staysail and jib - make all fast.' They filled: the boat reared like a horse and shot away. It must have been later than the time we'd planned, because all of a sudden the river was as light as though the sun was up. About a mile away on our right we could see the French bank clearly, and perhaps half a mile on the left, the Dutch. Right ahead, and perfectly distinct the white crests of the breaking ocean waves.

'Christ, we got the time wrong,' said Clousiot. 'Do you think we'll have long enough to get out?'

'I don't know.'

'Look how high the waves are, and how they break so white! Can the flood have started?'

'Impossible. I can see things going down.'

Maturette said, 'We shan't be able to get out. We shan't be there in time.'

'You shut your bloody mouth and sit there by the jib and staysail sheets. You shut up too, Clousiot.'

Bang. Bang. Rifles, shooting at us. I distinctly spotted the second. It was not screws firing at all: the shots were coming from Dutch Guiana. I hoisted the mainsail and it filled with such strength that the sheet tearing at my wrist nearly had me in the water. The boat lay over at more than forty-five degrees. I bore away as fast as I could - it wasn't hard, for there was wind and to spare. Bang, bang, bang, and then no more. We had run farther towards the French side than the Dutch, and that was certainly why the firing stopped.

We tore along at a blinding speed, with a wind fit to carry everything away. We were going so fast that we shot across the middle of the estuary, and I could see that in a few minutes' time we should be right up against the French bank. I could see men running towards the shore. Gently, as gently as possible, I came about, heaving on the sheet with all my strength. We came up into the wind: the jib went over all by itself and so did the staysail. The boat turned, turned, I let go the sheet and we ran out of the river straight before the wind. Christ, we'd done it! It was over! Ten minutes later a sea-wave tried to stop us; we rode over it smooth and easy, and the shwit shwit that the boat had made in the river changed to thumpo-thumpo-thump. The waves were high, but we went over them as easy as a kid playing leap-frog. Thump-o-thump, the boat went up and down the slopes without a shake or a tremble, only that thud of her hull striking the water as it came down.

'Hurray, hurray! We're out!' roared Clousiot with the full strength of his lungs.

And to light up our victory over the elements the Lord sent us an astonishing sunrise. The waves came in a steady rhythm. Their height grew less the farther we went from the shore. The water was filthy - full of mud. Over towards the north it looked black; but later on it was blue. I had no need to look at my compass: with the sun there on my right shoulder I steered straight ahead going large but with the boat lying over less, for I had slackened off the sheet until the sail was just drawing pleasantly. The great adventure had begun.

Clousiot heaved himself up. He wanted to get his head and shoulders out to see properly. Maturette came and gave him a hand, sitting him up there opposite me with his back against the barrel: he rolled me a cigarette, lit it and passed it. We all three of us smoked.

'Give me the tafia,' said Clousiot. 'This crossing of the bar calls for a drink.' Maturette poured an elegant tot into three tin mugs; we clinked and drank to one another. Maturette was sitting next to me on my left: we all looked at one another. Their faces were shining with happiness, and mine must have been the same. Then Clousiot said to me, 'Captain, sir, where are you heading for, if you please?'

'Colombia, if God permits.'

'God will permit all right, Christ above!' said Clousiot.

The sun rose fast and we dried out with no difficulty at all. I turned the hospital shirt into a kind of Arab burnous. Wetted, it kept my head cool and prevented sunstroke. The sea was an opal blue; the ten-foot waves were very wide apart, and that made sailing comfortable. The breeze was still strong and we moved fast away from the shore; from time to time I looked back and saw it fading on the horizon. The farther we ran from that vast green mass, the more we could make out the top of the land. I was gazing back when a vague uneasiness came to order and reminded me of my responsibility for my companions' lives and my own.

'I'll cook some rice,' said Maturette.

'I'll hold the stove and you hold the pot,' said Clousiot.

The bottle of paraffin was made fast right up for me.

no one was allowed to smoke. The fried rice smelt good. We ate it hot, with two tins of sardines stirred into it. On top of that we had a good cup of coffee. 'Some rum?' I refused: it was too hot. Besides, I was no drinker. Clousiot rolled me cigarette after cigarette and lit them for me. The first meal aboard had gone off well. Judging from the sun, we thought it was ten o'clock in the morning. We had had only five hours of running out to sea and yet you could already feel that the water beneath us was very deep. The waves were not so high now, and as we ran across them the boat no longer thumped. The weather was quite splendid. I realized that during daylight I should not have to be looking at the compass all the time. Now and then I fixed the sun in relation to the needle and I steered by that - it was very simple. The glare tired my eyes and I was sorry I had not thought to get myself a pair of dark glasses.

Out of the blue Clousiot said, 'What luck I had, finding you in hospital!'

'It was just as lucky for me - you're not the only one.' I thought of Dega and Fernandez ... if they'd said yes, they would have been here with us.

'That's not so certain,' said Clousiot. 'But it might have been tricky for you to get the Arab into the ward just at the right moment.'

'Yes, Maturette has been a great help to us. I'm very glad we brought him, he's as reliable as they come, brave and clever.'

'Thanks,' said Maturette. 'And thank you both for believing in me, although I'm so young and although I'm you know what. I'll do my best not to let you down.'

Then after a while I said, 'François Sierra too, the guy I'd so much wanted to have with us; and Galgani ...'

'As things turned out, Papillon, it just wasn't on. If Jesus had been a decent type and if he had given us a decent boat, we could have lain up and waited for them - we could have waited for Jesus to get them out and bring them. Anyhow, they know you, and they know that if you didn't send for them, it was on account of it just wasn't possible.'

'By the way, Maturette, how come you were in the high-security ward?'

'I never knew I was to be interned. I reported sick because I had a sore throat and because I wanted the walk, and when the doctor saw me he said, "I see from your card that you're for internment on the islands, Why?" "I don't know anything about it, Doctor. What's internment mean?" "All right. Never mind. Hospital for you." And there I was: that's all there was to it.'

'He meant to do you a good turn,' said Clousiot.

'What on earth did the quack want, sending me to hospital? Now he must be saying "My angel-faced boy wasn't such a wet after all, seeing he's got out - he's on the run".'

We talked and laughed. I said, 'Who knows but we may come across Julot, the hammer-man. He'll be far off by now, unless he's still lying up in the bush.' Clousiot said, 'When I left I put a note under my pillow saying, "Gone without leaving an address".' That made us roar with laughter.

Five days we sailed on with nothing happening. The east-west passage of the sun acted as my compass by day: by night I used the compass itself. On the morning of the sixth day we were greeted by a brilliant sun; the sea had suddenly calmed, and flying-fishes went by not far away. I was destroyed with fatigue. During the night Maturette had kept wiping my face with a wet cloth to keep me from sleeping; but even so I went off, and Clousiot had had to burn me with his cigarette. Now it was dead calm, so I decided to get some sleep. We lowered the mainsail and the jib, keeping just the staysail, and I slept like a log in the bottom of the boat, the sail spread to keep me from the sun.

I woke up with Maturette shaking me. He said, 'It's noon or one o'clock, but I'm waking you because the wind is getting stronger and on the horizon where it's coming from, everything's black.' I got up and went to my post. The one sail we had set was carrying us over the unruffled sea. In the east, behind me, all was black, and the breeze was strengthening steadily. The staysail and the jib were enough to make the boat run very fast. I furled the mainsail against the mast, carefully, and made all tight. 'Look out for yourselves, because what's coming is a storm.'

Heavy drops began to fall on us. The darkness came rushing forwards at an astonishing speed, and in a quarter of an hour it had spread from the horizon almost as far as us. Now here it came: an incredibly strong wind drove straight at us. As if by magic the sea got up faster, waves with foaming white tops: the sun was wiped right out, rain poured down in torrents.

could see nothing, and as the seas hit the boat so they sent packets of water stinging into my face. It was a storm all right, my first storm, with all the terrific splendour of nature unrestrained – thunder, lightning, rain, waves, the howling of the wind over and all around us.

The boat was carried along like a straw; she climbed unbelievable heights and ran down into hollows so deep you felt she could never rise up again. Yet in spite of these astonishing depths she did climb up the side of the next wave, go over the crest, and so begin once more – right up and down again and again. I held the tiller with both hands; and once, when I saw an even bigger wave coming I thought I should steer a little against it. No doubt I moved too fast, because just as we cut it, I shipped a great deal of water. The whole boat was aswim. There must have been about three foot of water aboard. Without meaning to I wrenched the boat strongly across the next wave – a very dangerous thing to do – and she leant over so much, almost to the point of turning turtle, that she flung out most of the water we had shipped.

'Bravo!' cried Clousiot. 'You're a real expert, Papillon! You emptied her straight-away.'

I said, 'You see now how it's done, don't you?'

If only he'd known that my lack of experience had very nearly turned us upside down, right out in the open sea! I decided not to struggle against the thrust of the waves any more, not to worry about what course to steer, but just to keep the boat as steady as possible. I took the waves three-quarters on; I let the boat run down and rise just as the sea would have it. Very soon I realized that this was an important discovery and that I'd done away with ninety per cent of the danger. The rain stopped: the wind was still blowing furiously, but now I could see clearly in front and behind. Behind, the sky was clear; in front it was black. We were in the middle of the two.

By about five it was all over. The sun was shining on us again, the breeze was its usual self, the sea had gone down: I hoisted the mainsail and we set off once more, pleased with ourselves. We baled the boat with the saucepans and we brought out the blankets to dry them by hanging them to the mast. Rice, flour, oil and double-strength coffee: a comforting shot of rum. The sun was about to set, lighting up the blue sea and making an unforgettable picture – reddish-brown sky, great yellow rays leaping up from the half-sunk orb and lighting the sky, and the few white clouds, and the sea itself. As the waves rose they were blue at the bottom, then green; and their crests were red, pink or yellow, according to the colour of the rays that hit them.

I was filled with a wonderfully gentle peace; and together with the peace a feeling that I could rely upon myself. I had stuck it out pretty well; this short storm had been very valuable to me. All by myself I had learnt how to handle the boat in such circumstances. I'd look forward to the night with a completely easy mind.

'So you saw how to empty a boat, Clousiot, did you? You saw how it was done?'

'Listen, brother, if you hadn't brought it off, and if another wave had caught us sideways, we'd have sunk. You're all right.'

'You learnt all that in the navy?' said Maturette.

'Yes. There's something to be said for a naval training, after all.'

We must have made a great deal of leeway. Who could tell how far we had drifted during those four hours, with a wind and waves like that? I'd steer north-west to make it up: that's what I'd do. The sun vanished into the sea, sending up the last flashes of its firework display – violet this time – and then at once it was night.

For six more days we sailed on with nothing to worry us except for a few squalls and showers – none ever lasted more than three hours and none were anything like that first everlasting storm.

Ten o'clock in the morning and not a breath of wind: a dead calm. I slept for nearly four hours. When I woke my lips were on fire. They had no skin left; nor had my nose either; and my right hand was quite raw. Maturette was the same; so was Clousiot. Twice a day we rubbed our faces and hands with oil, but that was not enough – the tropical sun soon dried it.

By the sun it must have been two o'clock in the afternoon. I ate, and then, seeing it was dead calm, we rigged the sail as an awning. Fish came round the boat where Maturette had done the washing-up. I took the jungle-knife and told Maturette to throw in some rice – anyhow it had begun to ferment since the water had got at it. The fish all gathered where the rice struck the water, all on the surface; and as one of them had his head almost out of the water I hit at him very hard. The next moment there he was, belly up. He weighed ~~about~~ pounds: we gutted him and cooked him in salt water. We ate him that evening with manioc flour.

Now it was eleven days since we had set out to sea. In all that time we had only seen one ship, very far away on the horizon. I began to wonder where the hell we were. Far out, that was for sure; but how did we lie in relation to Trinidad or any of the other English islands? Speak of the devil . . . and indeed there, right ahead, we saw a dark speck that gradually grew larger and larger. Would it be a ship or a deep-sea fishing boat? We'd got it all wrong: it was not coming towards us. It was a ship: we could see it clearly now, but going across. It was coming nearer, true enough, but its slanting course was not going to bring us together. There was no wind, so our sails drooped miserably: the ship would surely not have seen us. Suddenly there was the howl of a siren and then three short blasts. The ship changed course and stood straight for our boat.

'I hope she doesn't come too close,' said Clousiot.

'There's no danger: it's as calm as a millpond.'

She was a tanker. The nearer she came, the more clearly we could make out the people on deck. They must have been wondering what this nutshell of a boat was doing there, right out at sea. Slowly she approached, and now we could see the officers and the men of the crew. And the cook. Then women in striped dresses appeared on deck, and men in coloured shirts. We took it these were passengers. Passengers on a tanker - that struck me as odd. Slowly the ship came close and the captain hailed us in English, 'Where do you come from?'

'French Guiana.'

'Do you speak French?' asked a woman.

'Oui, Madame.'

'What are you doing so far out at sea?'

'We go where God's wind blows us.'

The lady spoke to the captain and then said, 'The captain says to come aboard. He'll haul your little boat on deck.'

'Tell him we say thank you very much but we're quite happy in our boat.'

'Why don't you want help?'

'Because we are on the run and we aren't going in your direction.'

'Where are you going?'

'Martinique or even farther. Where are we?'

'Far out in the ocean.'

had to wait another hour and more before we could distinguish people running towards the beach where we were going to land. In under twenty minutes a highly-coloured crowd had gathered. The entire little village had come out on to the shore to welcome us. Later we learnt that it was called San Fernando.

Three hundred yards from the beach I dropped the anchor: it bit at once. I did so partly to see how the people would take it and partly so as not to damage my boat when it grounded, supposing the bottom was coral. We furled the sails and waited. A little boat came towards us. Two blacks fiddling and one white man with a sun-helmet on.

'Welcome to Trinidad,' said the white man in perfect French. The black men laughed, showing all their teeth.

'Thank you for your kind words, Monsieur. Is the bottom coral or sand?'

'It's sand. You can run in without any danger.'

We hauled up the anchor, and the waves gently pushed us in towards the beach. We had scarcely touched before ten men waded in and with a single heave they ran the boat up out of the water. They gazed at us and stroked us, and Negro or Indian coolie women beckoned to invite us in. The white man who spoke French explained that they all wanted us to stay with them. Maturette caught up a handful of sand and kissed it. Great enthusiasm. I had told the white man about Clousiot's condition and he had him carried to his house, which was very close to the beach. He told us we could leave all our belongings in the boat until tomorrow - no one would touch anything. They all called out, 'Good captain, long ride in little boat.'

Night fell, and when I had asked them to heave the boat a little higher up I tied it to a much bigger one lying on the beach; then I followed the Englishman and Maturette came after me. There I saw Clousiot looking very pleased with himself in an armchair, with a lady and a girl beside him and his wounded leg stretched out on a chair.

'My wife and my daughter,' said the gentleman. 'I have a son at the university in England.'

'You are very welcome in this house,' said the lady in French.

'Sit down, gentlemen,' said the girl, placing us two wicker armchairs.

'Thank you, ladies, but please don't put yourselves out for us.'

'Why? We know where you come from, so be easy; and I say again, you are very welcome in this house.'

The Englishman was a barrister. Mr. Bowen was his name, and he had his office in Port of Spain, the capital, twenty-five miles away. They brought us tea with milk, toast, butter and jam. This was our first evening as free men, and I shall never forget it. Not a word about the past, no untimely questions: only how many days had we been at sea and what kind of voyage we had had. Whether Clousiot was in much pain and whether we should like them to tell the police tomorrow or wait for another day: whether we had any living relations, such as wives or children. If we should like to write to them, they would post the letters. What can I say? It was a wonderful welcome, both from the people on the shore and from this family with their extraordinary kindness to three men on the run.

Mr. Bowen telephoned a doctor, who told him to bring the wounded man in to his nursing-home tomorrow afternoon so that he could X-ray him and see what needed doing. Mr. Bowen also telephoned the head of the Salvation Army in Port of Spain. He said this man would have a room ready for us in the Salvation Army hostel and that we could go whenever we liked; he said we should keep our boat if it was any good, because we'd need it for leaving again. He asked if we were convicts or relégués and we told him convicts. He seemed pleased we were convicts.

'Would you like to have a bath and a shave?' asked the girl. 'Don't feel awkward, whatever you do - it doesn't worry us in the least. You'll find some things in the bathroom that I hope will fit you.'

I went into the bathroom, had a bath, shaved and came out again with my hair combed, wearing grey trousers, a white shirt, tennis shoes and white socks.

An Indian knocked on the door: he was carrying a parcel which he gave to Mathette, telling him the doctor had noticed that as I was roughly the same size as the lawyer I wouldn't need anything; but little Mathette wouldn't find anything to fit, because there was no one as small as him in Mr. Bowen's house. He bowed in the Mexican way and went out. What there I can say about even kindness? There is no doubt the feelings in my heart. Clousiot went to bed first, then the five of us talked about a great number of things. What interested those charming women most was how we thought of remaking a life for ourselves. Not a word about the past: only the present and the future. Mr. Bowen said how sorry he was Trinidad wouldn't permit escaped men to settle on the island. He'd often tried to get permission for various people to stay, he told us, but it had never been allowed.

The girl spoke very good French, like her father, with no accent or faulty pronunciation. She had fair hair and she was covered with freckles; she was between seventeen and twenty - I did not like to ask her age. She said, 'You're very young and your life is ahead of you: I don't know what you were sentenced for and I don't want to know, but the fact of having taken to sea in such a small boat for this long, dangerous voyage proves that you're willing to pay absolutely anything for your freedom; and that is something I admire very much.'

We slept until eight the next morning. When we got up we found the table laid. The two ladies calmly told us that Mr. Bowen had left for Port of Spain and would only be back that afternoon, bringing the information he needed to see what could be done for us.

By leaving his house to three escaped convicts like this he gave us a lesson that couldn't have been bettered: it was as though he were saying, 'You are normal decent human beings; you can see for yourselves how much I trust you, since I am leaving you alone in my house with my wife and daughter.' We were very deeply moved by this silent way of saying, 'Now that I've talked to you, I see that you are perfectly trustworthy - so much so that I leave you here in my home like old friends, not supposing for a moment that you could possibly do or say anything wrong.'

Reader - supposing this book has readers some day - I am not clever and I don't possess the vivid style, the living power, that is needed to describe this immense feeling of self-respect - no, of rehabilitation, or even of a new life. This figurative baptism, this bath of cleanliness, this raising of me above the filth I had sunk in, this way of bringing me overnight face to face with true responsibility, quite simply changed my whole being. I had been a convict, a man who could hear his chains even when he was free and who always felt that someone was watching over him; I had been all the things I had seen, experienced, undergone, suffered; all the things that had urged me to become a marked, evil man, dangerous at all times, superficially docile yet terribly dangerous when he broke out: but all this had vanished – disappeared as though by magic. Thank you, Mr. Bowen, barrister in His Majesty's courts of law, thank you for having made another man of me in so short a time!

The very fair-haired girl with eyes as blue as the sea around us was sitting with me under the coconut-palms in her father's garden. Red, yellow and mauve bougainvilleas were all in flower, and they gave the garden the touch of poetry that the moment called for. 'Monsieur Henri, [she called me Monsieur! How many years had it been since anyone called me Monsieur?] as Papa told you yesterday, the British authorities are so unfair, so devoid of understanding, that unfortunately you can't stay here. They only give you a fortnight to rest and then you must go off to sea again. I went to have a look at your boat early this morning: it looks very small and frail for such a long voyage as you have to make. Let's hope you reach a more hospitable, understanding country than ours. All the English islands do the same in these cases. If you have a horrid time in the voyage ahead of you, I do ask you not to hold it against the people who live in these islands. They are not responsible for this way of looking at things: these are orders that come from England, from people who don't know you. Papa's address is 101 Queen Street, Port of Spain, Trinidad. If it's God's will that you can do so, I beg you to send us just a line to tell us what happens to you.'

I was so moved I didn't know what to say. Mrs. Bowen came towards us. She was a very beautiful woman of about forty with chestnut hair and green eyes. She was wearing a very simple white dress with a white belt, and a pair of light-green sandals. 'Monsieur, my husband won't be home till five. He's getting them to allow you to go to Port of Spain in his car without a police escort. He also wants to prevent your having to spend the first night in the Port of Spain police-station. Your wounded friend will go straight to a nursing-home belonging to a friend of ours, a doctor; and you two will go to the Salvation Army hostel.'

Maturette joined us in the garden: he'd been to see the boat, and he told us it was surrounded by an interested crowd. Nothing had been touched. The people looking at it had found a by the captain of the Salvation Army together with all his staff, both men and women. He spoke a little French and all the others said things to us in English, which we did not understand; but their faces were so cheerful and their eyes so welcoming that we were sure the words were kind.

We were taken to a room on the second floor with three beds in it – the third being laid on for Clousiot. There was a bathroom just at hand, with towels and soap for us. When he had shown us our room, the captain said, 'If you would like to eat, we all have supper together at seven o'clock, that is to say in half an hour's time.'

'No. We're not hungry.'

'If you'd like to walk about the town, here are two West Indies dollars to have some tea or coffee, or an ice. Take great care not to get lost. When you want to come back just ask your way by saying "Salvation Army, please".'

Ten minutes later we were in the street. We walked along the pavements; we pushed our way among other people; nobody looked at us or paid any attention to us: we breathed deeply, appreciating these first steps, free in a town, to the full. This continual trust in us, letting us go free in a fair-sized city, warmed our hearts: it not only gave us self-confidence but made us aware that we must wholly deserve this trust. Matur-ette and I walked slowly along in the midst of the throng. We needed to be among people, to be jostled, to sink into the crowd and form part of it. We went into a bar and asked for two beers. It seems nothing much just to say 'Two beers, please.' It's so natural, after all. Yet still to us it seemed absolutely extraordinary when the Indian girl with the gold shell in her nose served us and then said, 'Half a dollar, sir.' Her pearly smile, her big dark violet eyes a little turned up at the corners, her shoulder-long black hair, her low-cut dress that showed the beginning of her breasts and let one guess the rest was splendid – all these things that were so trifling and natural for everybody else seemed to us to belong to some unheard-of fairyland. Hold it, Papi: this can't be true. It can't be true that you are turning from a convict with a life sentence, a living corpse, into a free man so quickly!

It was Maturette who paid: he had only half a dollar left. The beer was beautifully cool and he said, 'What about another?' It seemed to me that this second round was something we shouldn't do. 'Hell,' I said, 'it's not an hour since you've been really free and you're already thinking of getting drunk?"

'Easy, easy now, Papi! Having two beers and getting drunk, those are two very different things.'

'Maybe so. But it seems to me that rightly speaking, we shouldn't fling ourselves on the first pleasures that come to hand. I think we ought to just taste them little by little and not stuff ourselves like hogs. Anyhow, to begin with this money's not ours.'

'Fair enough: you're right. We must learn how to be free in slow stages - that's more our mark.'

We went out and walked down Watters Street, the main avenue that runs clean through the town; and we were so wonderstruck by the trams going by, the donkeys with their little carts, the cars, the lurid cinema and dance-hall advertisements, the eyes of the young black or Indian girls, who looked smilingly at us, that we went all the way to the harbour without noticing it. There in front of us were ships all lit up - tourist ships with bewitching names, Panama, Los Angeles, Boston, Quebec; cargo-ships from Hamburg, Amsterdam and London. And side by side all along the quay there were bars, pubs and restaurants, all crammed with men and women jammed together, drinking, singing, bawling one another out. Suddenly I felt an irresistible urge to mingle with this crowd - common maybe, but so full of life. On the terrace of one bar there were oysters, sea-eggs, shrimps, solens and mussels arranged on ice, a whole display of sea-food to excite the appetite of the passer-by. There were tables with red-and-white checked cloths to invite us to sit down - most of them were occupied. And there were coffee-coloured girls with delicate profiles, mulattoes without a single negroid feature, tight in their many-coloured, low-cut blouses, to make you feel even more eager to make the most of what was going.

I went up to one of them and said, 'French money good?' showing her a thousand-franc note. 'Yes, I change for you.' 'OK.' She took the note and vanished into a room crammed with people. She came back. 'Come here.' And she led me to the cash desk, where there was a Chinese sitting.

'You French?'

'Yes.'

'Change thousand francs?'

'Yes.'

'All West Indies dollars?'

'Yes.'

'Passport?'

'Got none.'

'Sailor's card?'

'Got none.'

'Immigration papers?'

'Got none.'

'Fine.' He said something to the girl: she looked over the room, went up to a nautical character with a cap like mine – gold band and anchor – and brought him to the cash desk. The Chinese said, 'Your identity card?'

'Here.'

And calmly the Chinese wrote out an exchange-form for a thousand francs in the stranger's name and made him sign it; then the girl took him by the arm and led him away. He certainly never knew what had happened. I got two hundred and fifty West Indies dollars, fifty of them in one and two-dollar notes. I gave the girl one dollar; we went outside, and sitting there at a table we treated ourselves to an orgy of sea-food, washed down with a delightful dry white wine.

Trinidad

I can still see our first night of freedom in that English town as clearly as though it was yesterday. We went everywhere, drunk with the light and the warmth in our hearts, and we plunged deep into the very being of the jolly, laughing crowd, overflowing with happiness. A bar, full of sailors and the tropical girls who were waiting there to pluck them. But there was nothing squalid about these girls; they were nothing like the women of the gutters of Paris, Le Havre or Marseilles. It was something else again – quite different. Instead of those over-made-up, vice-marked faces with their avid, cunning eyes, these were girls of every colour from Chinese yellow to African black, from light chocolate with smooth hair to the Hindu or Javanese whose parents had come together in the cocoa or sugar plantations, and so on to the Chinese-Indian girl with the gold shell in her nose and to the Llapane with her Roman profile and her copper-coloured face lit by two huge shining black eyes with long lashes, pushing out her half-covered bosom as though to say, 'Look how perfect they are, my breasts.' Each girl had different coloured flowers in her hair, and they were all of them the outward show of love; they made you long for women, without anything dirty or commercial about it. You didn't feel they were doing a job – they were really having fun and you felt that money was not the main thing in their lives.

Like a couple of moths drawn by the light, Maturette and I went blundering along from bar to bar. It was as we were coming out into a little brightly-lit square that I noticed the time on a church clock. Two. It was two o'clock in the morning! Quick, quick, we must hurry back. We had been behaving badly. The Salvation Army captain would have a pretty low opinion of us. We must get back at once. I hailed a taxi, which took us there. Two dollars. I paid and we walked into the hostel, very much ashamed of ourselves. A really young blonde woman-soldier of the Salvation Army, twenty-five or thirty years old, welcomed us pleasantly in the hall. She seemed neither astonished nor vexed at our coming home so late. After a few words in English – we felt they were good-natured and kind – she gave us the key of our room and said good night. We went to bed. In the suitcase I found a pair of pyjamas. As we were putting out the light, Maturette said, 'Still, I think we might say thank you to God for having given us so much so quickly. What do you think, Papi?'

'You thank Him for me – he's a great guy, your God. And you're dead right. He's been really generous with us. Good night.' And I turned the light out.

This rising from the dead, this breaking out from the graveyard in which I had been buried, these emotions all crowding one upon another, this night of bathing in humanity, reintegrating myself with life and mankind – all these things had been so exciting that I could not get off to sleep. I closed my eyes, and in a kind of kaleidoscope all sorts of pictures, things and feelings appeared, but in no order at all; they were sharp and clear, but they came without any regard for time – the assizes, the Conciergerie, then the lepers, then Saint-Martin-de-Ré, Tribouillard, Jesus, the storm . . . It was as though everything I had lived through for the past year was trying to appear at the same moment before the eye of memory in a wild, nightmarish dance. I tried to brush these pictures aside, but it was no good. And the strangest part of it was that they were all mixed up with the noise of the pigs, the shrieks of the hocco, the howling of the wind and the crash of waves, the whole wrapped in the sound of the one-stringed fiddles the Indians had been playing just a little while ago in the various bars we had visited.

Finally, at dawn, I dropped off. Towards ten o'clock there was a knock on the door. Mr. Bowen came in, smiling. 'Good morning, friends. Still in bed? You must have come home late. Did you have a good time?'

'Good morning. Yes, we came in late. We're sorry.'

'Come, come: not at all. It's natural enough, after all you've been through. You certainly had to make the most of your first night as free men. I've come so as to go to the police-station with you. You have to appear before them to make an official declaration of having entered the country illegally. When that formality's over we'll go and see your friend. They X-rayed him very early this morning. They will know the results later on.'

We washed quickly and went down to the room below, where Bowen was waiting for us with the captain.

'Good morning, my friends,' said the captain in bad French.

'Good morning, everybody.'

A woman officer of the Salvation Army said, 'Did you like Port of Spain?'

'Oh yes, Madame! It was quite a treat for us.'

After a quick cup of coffee we went to the police-station. We walked - it was only about two hundred yards. All the policemen greeted us; they looked at us without any particular curiosity. Having passed two ebony sentries in khaki uniform we went into an impressive, sparsely-furnished office. An officer of about fifty stood up: he wore shorts, a khaki shirt and tie, and he was covered with badges and medals. Speaking French he said, 'Good morning. Sit down. I should like to talk to you for a while before officially taking your statement. How old are you?'

'Twenty-six and nineteen.'

'What were you sentenced for?'

'Manslaughter.'

'What was your sentence?'

'Transportation and hard labour for life.'

'Then it was for murder, not manslaughter?'

'No, Monsieur, in my case it was manslaughter.'

'It was murder in mine,' said Maturette. 'I was seventeen.'

'At seventeen you know what you're doing,' said the officer. 'In England, if it had been proved, you would have hanged. Right. The British authorities are not here to judge the French penal system. But there's one thing we don't agree with, and that's the sending of criminals to French Guiana. We know it's an inhuman punishment and one quite unworthy of a civilized nation like France. But unfortunately you can't stay in Trinidad, nor on any other British island. It's impossible. So I ask you to play it straight and not try to find any excuse - sickness or anything like that - to delay your departure. You may stay here quite freely in Port of Spain for from fifteen to eighteen days. It seems that your boat is a good one. I'll have it brought round to the harbour for you. If there are any repairs needed the Royal Navy shipwrights will carry them out for you. On leaving you will be given the necessary stores, a good with him. He said to Clousiot, 'Who reduced the fracture for you, before splinting your leg?'

'Me and another guy who's not here.'

'You did it so well there's no need to break the leg again. The broken fibula was put back very neatly. We'll just plaster it and give you an iron so that you can walk a little. Would you rather stay here or go with your friends?'

'Go with them.'

'Well, tomorrow you'll be able to join them.'

We poured out our thanks. Mr. Bowen and the doctor left and we spent the rest of the morning and part of the afternoon with our friend. The next day we were delighted to find ourselves all together once more, the three of us in our hostel bedroom, with the window wide open and the fans going full blast to cool the air. We congratulated one another upon how fit we looked, and we said what fine fellows we were in our new clothes. When I saw the talk was going back over the past I said, 'Now let's forget the past as soon as possible and concentrate on the present and the future. Where shall we go? Colombia? Panama? Costa Rica? We ought to ask Bowen about the countries where we're likely to be admitted.'

I called Bowen at his chambers: he wasn't there. I called his house at San Fernando, and it was his daughter who answered. After some pleasant words she said, 'Monsieur Henri, in the Fish Market near the hostel there are buses for San Fernando. Why don't you come and spend the afternoon with us? Do come: I'll be expecting you.' And there we were, all three of us on the way to San Fernando. Clousiot was particularly splendid in his snuff-coloured semi-military uniform.

We were all three deeply moved by this return to the house that had taken us in with such kindness. It seemed as though the ladies understood our emotion, for both speaking together they said, 'So here you are, home again! Sit yourselves down comfortably.' And now, instead of saying Monsieur each time they spoke to us, they called us by our Christian names - 'Henri, please may I have the sugar? André [Maturette's name was André], a little more pudding?'

Mrs. Bowen and Miss Bowen, I hope that God has rewarded you for all the great kindness you showed us, and that your noble hearts - hearts that gave us so much joy - have never known anything but perfect happiness all your lives.

With a map spread out on the table, we asked their advice.

The distances were very great: seven hundred and fifty miles to reach Santa Marta, the nearest Colombian port, thirteen hundred miles to Panama; one thousand four hundred and fifty to Costa Rica. Mr. Bowen came home. 'I've telephoned all the consulates, and I've one piece of good news - you can stay a few days at Curaçao to rest. Colombia has no set rules about escaped prisoners. As far as the consul knows no one has ever reached Colombia by sea. Nor Panama nor anywhere else, either.'

'I know a safe place for you,' said Margaret, Mr. Bowen's daughter. 'But it's a great way off - one thousand eight hundred miles at least.'

'Where's that?' asked her father.

'British Honduras. The governor is my godfather.'

I looked at my friends and said, 'All aboard for British Honduras.' It was a British possession with the Republic of Honduras on the south and Mexico on the north. Helped by Margaret and her mother we spent the afternoon working out the course. First leg, Trinidad to Curaçao, six hundred and twenty-five miles; second leg, Curaçao to some island or other on our route; third leg, British Honduras.

As you can never tell what will happen at sea, we decided that in addition to the stores the police would give us, we should have a special case of tinned things to fall back on - meat, vegetables, jam, fish, etc. Margaret told us that the Salvatori Supermarket would be delighted to make us a present of them. 'And if they won't,' she said simply, 'Mama and I will buy them for you.'

'No, Mademoiselle.'

'Hush, Henri.'

'No, it's really not possible, because we have money and it wouldn't be right to profit by your kindness when we can perfectly well buy these stores ourselves.'

The boat was at Port of Spain, afloat in a Royal Navy dock. We left our friends, promising to see one another again before we finally sailed away. Every evening we went out punctually at eleven o'clock. Clousiot sat on a bench in the liveliest square and Maturette and I took it in turns to stay with him while the other wandered about the town. We had been here now for ten days. Thanks to the iron set in his plaster, Clousiot could walk without too much difficulty. We had learnt to get to the harbour by taking a tram. We often went in the afternoons and always at night. We were known and adopted in some of the bars down there. The police on guard saluted us and everybody knew who we were and where we came from, though there was never the slightest allusion to anything whatsoever. But we noticed that in the bars where we were known they charged us less for what we ate or drank than the sailors. It was the same with the tarts. Generally speaking, whenever they sat down at a table with sailors or officers or tourists they drank non-stop and always tried to make them spend as much as possible. In the bars where there was dancing, they would never dance with anyone unless he stood them a good many drinks first. But they all behaved quite differently with us. They would stay with us for quite a time and we had to press them before they'd drink anything at all: and then it wasn't their notorious tiny glass, but a beer or a genuine whiskey and soda. All this pleased us very much, because it was an indirect way of saying that they knew how we were fixed and that they were on our side.

The boat had been repainted and the gunwale raised six inches. The keel had been strengthened. None of her ribs had suffered, and the boat was quite sound. The mast had been replaced by a longer but lighter spar, and the flour-sack jib and staysail by good ochre-coloured canvas. At the naval basin a captain gave me a fully-graduated compass and showed me how I could find roughly where I was by using the chart. Our course for Curaçao was marked out - west by north.

The captain introduced me to a naval officer in command of the training-ship Tarpon, and he asked me if I would be so good as to go to sea at about eight the next morning and run a little way out of the harbour. I did not understand why, but I promised to do so. I was at the basin next day at the appointed time, with Maturette. A sailor came aboard with us and I sailed out of the harbour with a fair wind. Two hours later, as we were tacking in and out of the port, a man-of-war came towards us. The officers and crew, all in white, were lined up on the deck. They went by close to us and shouted 'Hurrah!' They turned about and dipped their ensign twice. It was an official salute whose meaning I didn't grasp. We went back to the naval basin, where the man-of-war was already tied up at the landing-stage. As for us, we moored alongside the quay. The sailor made signs to us to follow him; we went aboard and the captain of the ship welcomed us at the top of the gangway.

The bosun's pipe saluted our coming aboard, and when we had been introduced to the officers they led us past the cadets and petty-officers lined up and standing to attention. The captain said a few words to them in English and then they fell out. A young officer explained that the captain had just told the cadets we deserved a sailor's respect for having made such a long voyage in that little boat; he also told them we were about to make an even longer and more dangerous trip. We thanked the officer for the honour we had been paid. He made us a present of three oilskins – they were very useful to us afterwards. They were black, and they fastened with a long zip: they had hoods.

Two days before we left, Mr. Bowen came to see us with a message from the police superintendent asking us to take three relégués with us – they had been picked up a week before. These relégués had been landed on the island and according to them their companions had gone on to Venezuela. I didn't much care for the idea, but we had been treated too handsomely to be able to refuse to take the three men aboard. I asked to see them before giving my answer. A police-car came to fetch me. I went to see the superintendent, the high-ranking officer who had questioned us when we first came. Sergeant Willy acted as interpreter.

'How are you?'

'Very well, thanks. We should like you to do us a favour.'

'With pleasure, if it's possible.'

'There are three French relégués in our prison. They were on the island illegally for some weeks and they claim that their friends marooned them here and then sailed away. We believe it's a trick to get us to provide them with another boat. We have to get them off the island: it would be a pity if I were forced to hand them over to the purser of the first French ship that goes by.'

'Well, sir, I'll do the very best I possibly can; but I'd like to talk to them first. It's a risky thing to take three unknown men aboard, as you will certainly understand.'

'I understand. Willy, give orders to have the three Frenchmen brought out into the courtyard.'

I wanted to see them alone and I asked the sergeant to leave us to ourselves. 'You're relégués?'

'No. We're convicts.'

'What did you say you were relégués for, then?'

'We thought they'd rather have a man who'd done small crimes rather than big ones. We got it wrong: we see that now. And what about you? What are you?"

'Convict.'

'Don't know you.'

'I came on the last convoy. When did you?'

'The 1929 shipment.'

'Me on the '27,' said the third man.

'Listen: the superintendent sent for me to ask me to take you aboard — there are three of us already. He said that if I won't and that as there's not one of you who knows how to handle a boat, he'll be forced to put you aboard the first French ship that goes by. What have you got to say about it?'

'For reasons of our own we don't want to take to the sea again. We could pretend to leave with you and then you could drop us at the end of the island and carry on with your own break.'

'I can't do that.'

'Why not?'

'Because they've been good to us here and I'm not going to pay them back with a kick in the teeth.'

'Listen, brother, it seems to me you ought to put a convict before a rosbif.'

'Why?'

'Because you're a convict yourself.'

'Yes. But there are so many different kinds of convict that maybe there's more difference between you and me than there is between me and the rosbifs. It all depends on where you sit.'

'So you're going to let us be handed over to the French authorities?'

'No. But I'm not going to put you ashore before Curaçao, either.'

'I don't think I've the heart to begin all over again,' said one of them.

'Listen, have a look at the boat first. Perhaps the one you came in was no good.'

'Right. Let's have a go,' said the two others.

'OK. I'll ask the superintendent to let you come and have a look at the boat.'

Together with Sergeant Willy we all went down to the harbour. The three guys seemed more confident once they had seen the boat.

Setting off Again .

Two days later we and the three strangers left Trinidad. I can't tell how they knew about it, but a dozen girls from the bars came down to see us go, as well as the Bowens and the Salvation Army captain. When one of the girls kissed me, Margaret laughed, and said, 'Why, Henri, engaged so soon? You are a quick worker.'

'Au revoir, everybody! No: good-bye! But just let me say what a great place you have in our hearts - nothing'll ever change that.'

And at four in the afternoon we set out, towed by a tug. We were soon out of harbour, but we did not leave without wiping away a tear and gazing until the last moment at the people who had come to say good-bye and who were waving their white handkerchiefs. The moment the tug cast us off we set all our sails and headed into the first of the countless waves that we were to cross before we reached the end of our voyage.

There were two knives aboard: I wore one and Maturette the other. The axe was next to Clousiot, and so was the jungle-knife. We were certain that none of the others had any weapon. We arranged it so that only one of us should ever be asleep during the passage. Towards sunset the training-ship came and sailed along with us for half an hour. Then she dipped her ensign and parted company.

'What's your name?'

'Leblond.'

'Which convoy?'

'27.'

'What sentence?'

'Twenty years.'

'What about you?'

'Kargueret. 1929 convoy: fifteen years. I'm a Breton.'

'You're a Breton and you can't sail a boat?'

'That's right.'

The third said, 'My name's Dufil's and I come from Angers. I got life for a silly crack I made in court: otherwise it'd have been ten years at the outside. 1929 convoy.'

'What was the crack?'

'Well, I'd killed my wife with a flat-iron, you see. During the trial a juryman asked me why the flat-iron. I don't know what possessed me but I told him I'd used a flat-iron on account of she needed smoothing out. According to my lawyer it was that bloody-fool remark that made them give me such a dose.'

'Where did you all make your break from?'

'A logging camp they call Cascade, fifty miles from Saint-Laurent. It wasn't hard to get out - they give you a lot of freedom there. We just walked off, the five of us - nothing simpler.'

'How come, five? Where are the other two?'

An awkward silence. Clousiot said, 'Man, there are only straight guys here, and since we're together we've got to know. Tell.'

'I'll tell you, then,' said the Breton. 'We were five when we left, all right: but the two missing guys who aren't here now were from Cannes and they'd told us they were fishermen back at home. They paid nothing for the break because they said their work in the boat would be worth more than any money. Well, on the way we saw that neither the one nor the other knew the first thing about the sea. We were on the edge of drowning twenty times. We went creeping along the shore - first the coast of Dutch Guiana, then British Guiana, and then finally Trinidad. Between Georgetown and Trinidad I killed the one who said he would act as leader of the break. The guy had it coming to him, because to get off not paying he had lied to everyone about what a seaman he was. The other thought he was going to be killed too and he threw himself into the sea during a squall, letting go the tiller. We managed as best we could. We let the boat fill with water a good many times and in the end we smashed against a rock - it was a miracle we got out alive. I give you my word of honour everything I've said is the exact truth.'

'It's true,' said the two others. 'That's just how it happened, and we all three of us agreed about killing the guy. What do you say about it, Papillon?'

'I'm in no position to judge.'

'But what would you have done in our place?' insisted the Breton.

'I'd have to think it over. You want to live through things like that to know what's right and what's not: otherwise you just can't tell where the truth lies.'

Clousiot said, 'I'd have killed him, all right. That lie might have caused the death of everyone aboard.'

'OK. Let's scrub it. But I've got a hunch you were scared through and through. You're still scared, and you're only at sea because there's no choice. Is that right?'

'Bleeding right,' they answered all together.

'Well then, there's not got to be any panic here, whatever happens. Whatever happens nobody's got to show he's afraid. If anyone's scared, just let him keep his trap shut. This is a good boat: it's proved that. We're heavier laden than we were, but then she's been raised six inches all round. That more than compensates.'

We smoked; we drank coffee. We had had a good meal before leaving and we decided not to have another before next morning.

This was 9 December 1933, forty-two days since the break had started in the high security ward of the hospital at Saint-Laurent. It was Clousiot, the company's accountant, who told us that. I had three very valuable things that we lacked when we set out – a waterproof steel watch bought in Trinidad, a real good compass in gimbals, and a pair of celluloid sunglasses. Clousiot and Maturette each had a cap.

Three days passed with nothing much happening, apart from our twice meeting with schools of dolphins. They made our blood run cold, because one band of eight started playing with the boat. First they'd run under it longways and come up just in front – sometimes one of them would touch us. But what really made us quake was the next caper. Three dolphins in a triangle, one in front and then two abreast, would race straight for our bows, tearing through the water. When they were within a hair's breadth of us they would dive and then come up on the right and the left of the boat. Although we had a good breeze and we were running right before it they went still faster than we did. The game lasted for hours: it was ghastly. The slightest mistake on their part and they would have tipped us over. The three newcomers said nothing, but you should have seen their miserable faces!

In the middle of the night of the fourth day a perfectly horrible storm broke out. It really was something quite terrifying. The worst part of it was that the waves didn't follow one another in the same direction. As often as not they collided and broke against one another. Some were long and deep, others choppy – there was no understanding it. Nobody uttered a word except for Clousiot: from time to time he called out; ‘Go it, mate! You’ll do this one, just like the rest.’ Or ‘Keep an eye out for the one behind!’

A very curious thing was that sometimes they would come three-quarters on, roaring and capped with foam. Fine: I’d have plenty of time to judge their speed and work out the right angle to take them. Then suddenly, unreasonably, there’d be one roaring right up over the boat’s stern, immediately behind. Many a time they broke over my shoulders and then of course a good deal came into the boat. The five men baled non-stop with tins and saucepans. Still, I never filled her more than a quarter full and so we were never in danger of sinking. This party lasted a good half of the night, close on seven hours. Because of the rain we never saw the sun at all until eight.

We were all of us, including me, heartily glad to see this sun shining away with all its might after the storm. Before anything else, coffee. Scalding hot coffee with Nestlé’s milk and ship’s biscuits: they were as hard as iron, but once they were dunked in coffee they were wonderful. The night’s struggle against the storm had worn me right out, and although there was still a strong wind and a heavy, uneven sea, I asked Maturette to take over for a while. I just had to sleep. I hadn’t been lying down ten minutes before Maturette took a wave the wrong way and the boat was three quarters swamped. Everything was afloat – tins, stove, blankets, the lot. I reached the tiller with the water up to my waist and I just had time to avoid a breaking wave coming right down upon us. With a heave of the tiller I put us stern-on: the sea did not come in but thrust us forward for a good ten yards.

Everyone baled. With the big saucepan Maturette flung out three gallons at a time. No one bothered about saving anything at all – there was only one idea and that was to empty the boat of all this water that was making her so heavy that she could not struggle against the sea. I must admit the three newcomers behaved well; and when the Breton’s tin was swept away, alone he took the quick decision to ease the boat by letting go the water-cask, which he heaved overboard. Two hours later everything was dry, but we had lost our blankets, primus, charcoal stove and charcoal, the wicker bottle of paraffin and the water-cask, the last on purpose.

At midday I went to put on another pair of trousers, and it was then that I noticed that my little suitcase had gone overboard too, together with two of the three oilskins. Right at the bottom of the boat we found two bottles of rum. All the tobacco was either gone or soaked: the leaves and their watertight tin had disappeared. I said, 'Brothers, let's have a good solid tot of rum to begin with, and then open the reserves and see what we can reckon on. Here's fruit juice: good. We'll ration ourselves for what we can drink. Here are some tins of biscuits: let's empty one and make a stove of it. We'll stow the other tins in the bottom of the boat and make a fire with the wood of the box. A little while ago we were all pretty scared, but the danger's over now: we've just got to get over it and not let the others down. From this moment on, no one must say "I'm thirsty", no one must say "I'm hungry"; and no one must say "I feel like a smoke". OK?'

'OK, Papi.'

Everyone behaved well and providentially the wind dropped so that we could make a soup with bully-beef for a basis. A mess tin full of this with ship's biscuits soaked in it gave us a comfortable lining, quite enough until tomorrow. We brewed a very little green tea for each man. And in an unbroken box we found a carton of cigarettes: they were little packets of eight, and there were twenty-four of them. The other five decided that I alone should smoke, to help me keep awake; and so there should be no ill-feeling, Clousiot refused to light them for me, but he did pass me the match. What with this good understanding aboard, nothing unpleasant happened at any time.

Now it was six days since we had sailed, and I had not yet been able to sleep. But this afternoon I did sleep, the sea being as smooth as glass: I slept, flat out, for nearly five hours. It was ten in the evening when I woke. A flat calm still. They had had a meal without me and I found a very well cooked kind of polenta made of maize flour - tinned, of course - and I ate it with a few smoked sausages. It was delicious. The tea was almost cold, but that didn't matter in the least. I smoked, waiting for the wind to make up its mind to blow.

The night was wonderfully starlit. The pole star shone with all its full brilliance and only the Southern Cross outdid it in splendour. The Great and the Little Bear were particularly clear. Not a cloud, and already the full moon was well up in the starry sky. The Breton was shivering. He had lost his jacket and he was down to his shirt. I lent him the oilskin.

We began the seventh day. 'Mates, we can't be very far from Curaçao. I have a hunch I made a little too much northing, so now I'll steer due west, because we mustn't miss the Dutch West Indies. That would be serious, now we've no fresh water left and all the food's gone except for the reserve.'

'We leave it to you, Papillon,' said the Breton.

'Yes, we leave it to you,' said all the others together. 'You do what you think right.'

'Thanks.'

It seemed to me that what I had said was best. All night long the wind had failed us and it was only about four in the morning that a breeze set us moving again. This breeze strengthened during the forenoon, and for thirty-six hours it blew strong enough to carry us along at a fair rate, but the waves were so gentle we never thumped at all.

Curaçao

Gulls. First their cries, because it was still dark, and then the birds themselves, wheeling above the boat. One settled on the mast, lifted off, then settled again. All this flying around lasted three hours and more until the dawn came up, with a brilliant sun. Nothing on the horizon showed any hint of land. Where the hell did all these gulls and sea-birds come from? Our eyes searched throughout the day, and searched in vain. Not the least sign of land anywhere near. The full moon rose just as the sun was setting; and this tropical moon was so strong that its glare hurt my eyes. I no longer had my dark glasses – they had gone with that diabolical old wave, as well as all our caps. At about eight o'clock, very far away in this lunar daylight, we saw a dark line on the horizon.

'That's land all right,' said I, the first of us all to say it.

'Yes, so it is.'

In short, everybody agreed that they could see a dark line that must be land of some sort. All through the rest of the night I kept my bows pointed towards this shadow, which grew clearer and clearer. We were getting there. No clouds, a strong wind and tall but regular waves, and we were running in as fast as we could go. The dark mass did not rise high over the water, and there was no way of telling whether the coast was cliffs, rocks or beach. The moon was setting on the far side of the land, and it cast a shadow that prevented me from seeing anything except a line of lights at sea-level, continuous at first and then broken. I came closer and closer, and then, about half a mile from the shore, I dropped anchor. The wind was strong, the boat swung round and faced the waves, which it took head-on every time. It tossed us around a great deal and indeed it was very uncomfortable. The sails were lowered and furled, of course. We might have waited until daylight in this unpleasant but safe position, but unhappily the anchor suddenly lost its hold. To steer a boat, it has to be moving: otherwise the rudder has no bite. We hoisted the jib and-stay-sail, but then a strange thing happened – the anchor would not get a grip again. The others hauled the rope aboard: it came in without any anchor. We had lost it. In spite of everything I could do the waves kept heaving us in towards the rocks of this land in such a dangerous way that I decided to hoist the mainsail and run in on purpose – run in fast. This I carried out so successfully that there we were, wedged between two rocks, with the boat absolutely shattered. No one bawled out in panic, but when the next wave came rolling in we all plunged into it and ended up on shore, battered, tumbled, soaked, but alive. Only Clousiot, with his plastered leg, had a worse time than the rest of us. His arm, face and hands were badly scraped. We others had a few bangs on the knees, hands and ankles. My ear had come up against a rock a little too hard, and it was dripping with blood.

Still, there we were, alive on dry land, out of the reach of the waves. When day broke we picked up the oilskin and I turned the boat over – it was beginning to go to pieces. I managed to wrench the compass from its place in the stern-sheets. There was no one where we had been cast up, nor anywhere around. We looked at the line of lights, and later we learned that they were there to warn fishermen that the place was dangerous. We walked away, going inland; and we saw nothing.

only cactuses, huge cactuses, and donkeys. We reached a well tired out, for we had had to carry Clousiot, taking turns with two of us making a kind of chair with joined hands. Round the well there were the dried carcasses of goats and asses. The well was empty, and the windmill that had once worked it was now turning idly, bringing nothing up. Not a soul; only these goats and donkeys.

We went on to a little house whose open doors invited us to walk in. We called out 'Halool! Halool!' Nobody. On the chimney-piece a canvas bag with its neck tied by a string; I took it and opened it. As I opened it the string broke - it was full of florins, the Dutch currency. So we were on Dutch territory: Bonaire, Curaçao or Aruba. We put the bag back without touching anything; we found water and each drank in turn out of a ladle. No one in the house, no one anywhere near. We left, and we were going along very slowly, because of Clousiot, when an old Ford blocked our path.

'Are you Frenchmen?'

'Yes, M^{onsieur}.'

'Get into the car, will you?' Three got in behind and we settled Clousiot on their knees; I sat next to the driver and Maturette next to me.

'You've been wrecked?'

'Yes.'

'Anyone drowned?'

'No.'

'Where do you come from?'

'Trinidad.'

'And before that?'

'French Guiana.'

'Convicts or relégués?'

'Convicts.'

'I'm Dr. Naal, the owner of this property; it's a peninsula running out from Curaçao. They call it Ass's Island. Goats and asses live here, feeding on the cactuses, in spite of the long thorns. The common nickname for those thorns is the young ladies of Curaçao.'

I said, 'That's not very flattering for the real young ladies of Curaçao.' The big, heavy man laughed noisily. With an asthmatic gasp the worn-out Ford stopped of its own accord. I pointed to a herd of asses and said, 'If the car can't manage it any more, we can easily have ourselves pulled.'

house and then come out of it again. He's an employee of mine - he looks after some of my asses.'

'And just because we went into the house does that mean we're thieves? What you say doesn't make sense, Monsieur; all we did was to take some water - you don't call that theft, do you?'

'And what about the bag of florins?'

'Yes, I did open that bag; and in fact I broke the string as I did so. But I most certainly didn't do anything but look to see what kind of money it had in it, and so to find out what country we had reached. I scrupulously put the money and the bag back where they were, on the chimney-piece.'

The policeman looked me right in the eye, and then turning he spoke to the character on the bicycle very severely. Dr. Naal made as though to speak. Harshly, in the German style, the superintendent cut him short. Then he made the newcomer get into the open car next to the chauffeur, got in himself with two policemen and drove off. Naal and the other man who had come with him walked into the house with us.

'I must explain,' he said. 'That man had told me the bag had vanished. Before having you searched, the superintendent questioned him, because he thought he was lying. If you're innocent, I'm very sorry about the whole thing; but it wasn't my fault.'

Less than a quarter of an hour later the car came back and the superintendent said to me, 'You told the truth: that man was a disgusting liar. He will be punished for having tried to damage you like this.' Meanwhile the fellow was being loaded aboard the black maria: the five others got in too and I was about to follow when the superintendent held me back and said, 'Get into my car next to the driver.' We set out ahead of the van and very quickly we lost sight of it. We took proper macadamed roads and then came to the town with its Dutch-looking houses. Everything was very clean, and most of the people were on bicycles - there were hundreds of them coming and going in every direction. We reached the police-station. We went through a big office with a good many policemen in it, all dressed in white and each at his own desk, and we came to an inner room. It had air-conditioning, and it was cool. A big fat fair-haired man of about forty was sitting there in an armchair. He got up and spoke in Dutch. When their first remarks were over the superintendent, speaking French, said,

'This is the chief of police of Curaçao. Chief, this Frenchman is the leader of the band of six we've just picked up.'

'Very good, Superintendent. As shipwrecked men, you are welcome to Curaçao. What's your name?'

'Henri.'

'Well, Henri, you have had a very unpleasant time with this business of the bag of money, but from your point of view it's all for the best, because it certainly proves you are an honest man. I'll give you a sunny room with a bunk in it so you can get some rest. Your case will be put before the governor and he will take appropriate measures. The superintendent and I will speak in your favour.' He shook hands and we left. In the courtyard Dr. Naal apologized and promised to use his influence on our behalf. Two hours later we were all shut up in a very large kind of ward with a dozen beds in it and a long table and benches down the middle. Through the open window we asked a policeman to buy us tobacco, cigarette-paper and matches, with Trinidad dollars. He did not take the money and we didn't understand his reply.

'That coal-black character seems too devoted to his duty by half,' said Clousiot. 'We still haven't got that tobacco.'

I was just about to knock on the door when it opened. A little man looking something like a coolie and wearing prison uniform with a number on the chest so that there should be no mistake, said, 'Money, cigarettes.' 'No. Tobacco, matches and paper.' A few minutes later he came back with all these things and with a big steaming pot – chocolate or cocoa. He brought bowls too, and we each of us drank one full.

I was sent for in the afternoon, and I went to the chief of police's office again. 'The governor has given me orders to let you walk about in the prison courtyard. Tell your companions not to try to escape, for that would lead to very serious consequences for all of you. Since you are the leader, you may go into the town for two hours every morning, from ten until twelve, and then in the afternoon from three until five. Have you any money?'

'Yes. English and French.'

'A plain-clothes policeman will go with you wherever you choose during your outings.'

'What are they going to do to us?'

'I think we'll try to get you aboard tankers one by one – tankers of different nationalities. Curaçao has one of the big' gest oil refineries in the world: it treats oil from Venezuela, and so there are twenty or twenty-five tankers from all countries coming and going every day. That would be the ideal solution for you, because then you would reach the other countries without any sort of difficulty.'

'What countries, for example? Panama, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Mexico, Canada, Cuba, the United States or the countries which have English laws?'

'Impossible. Europe's just as impossible too. Don't you worry: just you rely on us and let us do our best to help you make a new start in life.'

'Thank you, Chief.'

I repeated all this very exactly to my companions. Clousiot, the sharpest crook of us all, said, 'What do you think of it, Papillon?'

'I don't know yet. I'm afraid it may be a piece of soap so we'll keep quiet and not escape.'

'I'm afraid you may be right,' he said.

The Breton believed in this wonderful scheme. The flat-iron guy was delighted: he said, 'No more boats, no more adventures, and that's for sure. We each of us land up in some country or other aboard a big tanker and then we fade right away.' Leblond was of the same opinion.

'What about you, Maturette?'

And this kid of nineteen, this little wet-leg who had accidentally been turned into a convict, this boy with features finer than a girl, raised his gentle voice and said, 'And do you people really think these square-headed cops are going to produce bent papers for each one of us? Or even actually forge them? I don't. At the most they might close their eyes if we went off one by one, and illegally got aboard a tanker on its way out: but nothing more. And even then they'd only do so to get rid of us without a headache. That's what I think. I don't believe a word of it.'

I went out very little: just now and then in the mornings, to buy things. We had been here a week now, and nothing had happened. We were beginning to feel anxious. One evening we saw three priests accompanied by policemen going round the cells and wards. They stopped for a long while in the cell nearest to us, where a Negro accused of rape was shut up. We thought they might come to see us, so we went back into the ward and sat there, each on his bed. And indeed all three of them did come in, together with Dr. Naal, the chief of police and someone in a white uniform I took to be a naval officer.

'Monseigneur, here are the Frenchmen,' said the chief of police in French. 'Their behaviour has been excellent.'

'I congratulate you, my sons. Let us sit down on the benches round this table; we shall be able to talk better like that.' Everyone sat down, including the people who were with the bishop. They brought a stool that stood by the door in the courtyard and put it at the head of the table. That way the bishop could see everybody. 'Nearly all Frenchmen are Catholics: is there any one among you who is not?' Nobody put up his hand. It seemed to me that I too ought to look upon myself as a Catholic. 'My friends, I descend from a French family. My name is Irénée de Bruyne. My people were Huguenots, Protestants who fled to Holland at the time Catherine de Medici was hunting them down. So I am a Frenchman by blood. I am the bishop of Curaçao, a town where there are more Protestants than Catholics, but where the Catholics are very zealous and attentive to their duties. What is your position?'

'We are waiting to be put aboard tankers, one by one.'

'How many of you have left in this way?'

'None, so far.'

'Hmm. What have you to say to that, Chief? Be so kind as to answer in French – you speak it so well.'

'Monseigneur, the governor really did have the idea of helping these men in this way, but in all frankness I must tell you that so far not a single captain has agreed to take one, principally because they have no passports.'

'That's where we must start, then. Couldn't the governor give each one a special passport for the occasion?'

'I don't know. He's never talked to me about that.'

'The day after tomorrow I shall say a mass for you. Would you like to come to confession tomorrow afternoon? I'll confess you myself – I'll do all I can for you so that the good Lord will forgive your sins. Is it possible for you to have these men sent to the cathedral at three o'clock?'

'Yes.'

'I should like them to come in a taxi or a private car.'

'I'll bring them myself, Monseigneur,' said Dr. Naal.

'Thank you. My sons, I promise you nothing. Just one perfectly true word – from now on I shall try to be as useful to you as I possibly can.'

When we saw Naal kiss his ring and then the Breton do the same we all touched it with our lips and went with him as far as his car, which was parked in the courtyard.

The next day everybody went to the bishop for confession. I was the last.

'Come, my son, let us begin with the gravest sin.'

'Father, to begin with I'm not baptized; but a priest in the prison in France told me that whether you were baptized or not, everyone was God's child.'

He was right. Very well. Let us leave the confessional and you can tell me all about it.'

I told him the story of my life in detail. At great length, patiently and very attentively this prince of the Church listened to me without interrupting. He took my hands in his and often he looked me full in the face; and then sometimes, when I came to passages that were hard to bring out, he lowered his eyes to help me in my confession. This sixty-year-old priest's eyes and face were so pure that there was an almost child-like reflection in them. The transparent cleanliness of his soul (full of boundless kindness, I was sure) shone in all his features; and the gaze of his pale grey eyes entered into me, as soothing as balm to a wound. Gently, very gently, and still holding my hands in his, he spoke to me in so quiet a voice that it was almost a whisper. 'God sometimes requires His children to bear with human wickedness so that the one He has chosen as a victim may emerge stronger and nobler than before. Reflect, my son: if you had not been forced to undergo this calvary you would never have been able to raise yourself to such heights or to bring yourself so close to divine truth. I will go even farther. The people, the system, the workings of this horrible machine that has ground you down, and the fundamentally evil beings who in their different ways have tormented and harmed you, have in fact done you the greatest service they possibly could. They have brought a new person into being inside you, better than the first; and it is to them that you owe it that now you possess a sense of honour, kindness and charity, as well as the will-power needed to conquer all these difficulties and to become a finer man. In a person like you these notions of revenge cannot prosper: nor can the idea of punishing each one according to the harm he has done you. You must be a saviour of men. You must not live to hurt others, even though you may think it justified. God has been open-handed towards you; He has said to you 'Help yourself, and I will help you'. He has helped you in everything, and He has even allowed you to save others and to bring them to freedom. Above all, do not suppose that the sins you have committed are so very grave. There are plenty of highly-placed people who are guilty of much more serious misconduct than yours. Yet the punishment inflicted by human justice has not given them the opportunity of rising above themselves as you have done.'

'Thank you, Father. You have done me an enormous amount of good: it will last me all my life. I shall never forget it.' And I kissed his hands.

'You must set off again, my son, and come face to face with other perils. I should like to christen you before you go. What do you say?'

'Father, leave me like this for a moment. My father brought me up without any religion. He has a heart of gold. When Maman died he somehow managed to take her place, with all the things a mother would say or do, and all a mother's affection. It seems to me that if I let myself be christened, I should somehow be betraying him. Just let me be completely free for a while, with a proper set of papers and an ordinary way of earning my living, so that when I write to him I can ask whether I can leave his philosophy - whether I can be christened without grieving him.'

'I understand, my son, and I am sure God is with you. I give you my blessing and I beg that God will protect you.'

'There,' said Dr. Naal, 'you see how Monseigneur Irénée de Bruyne's sermon shows you the whole man himself?'

'Certainly I do. Tell me, what are you thinking of doing now?'

'I am going to ask the governor to give orders for me to have the preference in the next sale of confiscated smuggling boats. You will come with me to tell me your opinion and pick the one you think most suitable. For the rest, stores and clothes, it will be easy.'

From the day of the bishop's sermon we had a constant flow of visitors, particularly at about six in the evening. They were people who wanted to know us. They sat on the benches by the table and each brought something that he would put down on a bed and leave, without saying anything about it.

About two in the afternoon the Little Sisters of the Poor would appear, accompanied by their Superior; they spoke French very well. Their basket was always full of good things they had cooked themselves. The Mother Superior was very young – less than forty. You could not see her hair, because it was hidden under her white coif, but her eyes were blue and her eyebrows fair. She belonged to a great family in Holland (Dr. Naal told us) and she had written home to see whether something could be done for us instead of our being sent off to sea again. We spent some pleasant hours together and she would ask me to tell the story of our escape. Sometimes she would ask me to tell the nuns who came with her and who spoke French. And if I forgot a detail or skipped it she would gently call me to order. 'Henri, not so fast. You have skipped the story of the hocco . . . Why are you forgetting the ants today? They are very important, since it was because of the ants that the Masked Breton came upon you by surprise.' I tell all this, because those were such gentle, kindly moments and so wholly unlike everything we had lived through that our horrible rotting former life seemed to be lit up by a heavenly light and to become unreal.

I saw the boat, a splendid twenty-five-foot craft with a deep keel, a very long mast and a huge spread of sail. It was perfectly designed for smuggling. It was fully equipped, but there were wax customs seals all over it. At the auction someone began the bidding at six thousand florins, or round about a thousand dollars. To cut the story short, after a few whispered words between this man and Dr. Naal they let us have it for six thousand and one florins.

In five days we were ready. Newly painted and crammed with stores all carefully stowed below, this half-decked boat was a kingly gift. A suitcase for each man, six suitcases filled with new clothes, shoes and everything necessary, were lined up in a waterproof tarpaulin and then stowed on the deck.

The Prison at Rio Hacha

We left at dawn. The doctor and the nuns came to say good-bye. We slipped our moorings easily; the wind took us right away and we sailed out of the harbour. A brilliant sun came up and we had an untroubled day before us. In no time I found that the boat had too much in the way of sail and not enough ballast. I made up my mind to be very cautious. We raced along: from the point of view of speed this boat was a thoroughbred but she was both touchy and nervous. I steered due west.

It had been decided that we should land our three passengers from Trinidad illegally on the coast of Colombia. They wouldn't have anything whatever to do with a long voyage; they said they trusted in me all right, but not in the weather. And in fact the forecasts in the papers we had read in prison spoke of storms and even hurricanes. I acknowledged they were within their rights and it was agreed we should land them on a barren, uninhabited peninsula called Goajira. As for us, we should set off again for British Honduras.

The weather was magnificent, and the starlit night with a brilliant half moon made our scheme for landing them all the easier. We ran straight for the Colombian coast: I dropped anchor and foot by foot we sounded to see when they could go ashore. Unhappily the water was very deep and we had to go dangerously close to the rocky coast before we had less than five feet. We shook hands: each of them got out, stood there in the sea with his suitcase on his head, and waded to the land. We watched them closely and rather sadly. They were companions who had faced up to things well; they had never let us down at any time. It was a pity they were leaving the boat. While they were making their way ashore the wind dropped entirely. Hell! What if we were seen from the village shown on the map – the village called Rio Hacha? That was the nearest port with police in it. Let's hope not. I had the feeling we were much nearer than we had meant to be, because of that lighthouse on the headland we had just passed.

Wait, wait . . . The three men had disappeared, having waved good-bye with a white handkerchief. A breeze, for God's sake! A breeze to carry us away from this Colombian coast: for as far as we were concerned the country was one big question mark. No one knew whether they handed escaped prisoners back or not. All three of us would rather have the certainty of British Honduras than this unknown Colombia. It was not until three in the afternoon that there was a wind and we were able to get under way. I set everything, and with perhaps too much aboard we sailed along for a couple of hours: then a launch filled with men appeared, steering straight for us and firing shots in the air to make us stop. I ran on without obeying, trying to get out to sea, out of territorial waters. Impossible. The powerful launch caught up with us in less than an hour and a half's chase, and with ten rifles pointing at us we were forced to surrender.

The soldiers or maybe policemen who had arrested us all had much the same look: they all wore dirty trousers that had once been white and ragged singlets that had never been washed at any time, and they were all of them, except for the 'captain', barefoot - he was better dressed and cleaner. But although they were badly dressed they were very well armed: a full cartridge-belt round their waists, well-kept rifles and a long sheathed dagger into the bargain, the hilt just at hand. The one they called captain looked like a half-caste and a murderer. He had a heavy revolver, and he too wore it with a well-filled bandolier. As they only spoke Spanish we could not make out their meaning, but neither their looks nor their motions nor their tone of voice were friendly: far from it.

We walked from the harbour to the prison, going through the village, which was indeed Rio Hacha, escorted by six toughs with three more a couple of paces behind, their guns trained on us. It was not the most friendly of welcomes.

We reached the courtyard of a prison with a little wall round it. There were about twenty dirty, bearded prisoners sitting about or standing, and they looked at us with hostile eyes. 'Vamos, vamos.' We understood the soldiers to mean. 'Come on, come on,' which was hard for us, because although Clou-siot was a good deal better he still had to walk on the iron in his plastered leg and he could not go fast. The 'captain' had stayed behind and now he caught us up with the compass and the oilskin under his arm. He was eating our biscuits and chocolate and we instantly grasped that we were going to be stripped bare. And we weren't mistaken, either. They shut us up in a filthy room with heavy bars over the window. There ere some planks on the ground with a kind of wooden pillow eside them; those were the beds. A prisoner came to the win-ow after the police had left and called to us, 'Frenchmen, renchmen!'

'What do you want?'

'Frenchmen, no good, no good.'

'Who do you mean, no good?'

'Police.'

'Police?'

'Yes, police are no good.'

And he disappeared. Night fell; the room was lit by a bulb hat must have been of a very low voltage, for it gave hardly ny light. Mosquitoes buzzed round our ears and got into our oses.

'Well, a fine mess we're in! It's going to cost us a packet, aving landed those guys.'

'That's how it is: we couldn't tell. The real thing was there was no wind.'

'You went in too close,' said Clousiot.

'Just you shut your trap, will you? This is no time for blame: this is when we've got to back one another up. We've got to hold together now more than ever.'

'Sorry: you're right, Papi. It was nobody's fault.'

Oh, it would be too unfair if the break were to come to an end here, so wretchedly, after we'd had such a struggle. They had not searched us. I had my charger in my pocket and I hurriedly stuffed it up. So did Clousiot. We had been wise not to throw them away. In any case they were watertight wallets, easy to carry, and they took up very little room. According to my watch it was eight in the evening. They brought us some dark brown sugar, a lump the size of your fist for each man, and three what you might call gobs of boiled and salted rice.
'Buenas noches.' 'That must mean good night,' said Maturette.

At seven the next day they gave us very good coffee in wooden bowls out there in the courtyard. At about eight the captain came by. I asked him for permission to go to the boat to fetch our things. He either didn't understand or he pretended not to. The more I saw him the more he seemed to me to have a murdering kind of a face. On the left-hand side of his belt he had a little bottle in a leather case: he took it out, uncorked it, drank a mouthful, spat and offered it to me. This was the first friendly gesture we had seen, so I took it and dr unately I had only poured a very little into my mouth – it was liquid fire and it tasted like methylated spirits. Quickly I swallowed and began to cough, which made this half-black half-Indian laugh very cheerfully.

At ten o'clock several civilians appeared, dressed in white and wearing ties. There were six or seven of them, and they went into a building that seemed to be the prison's administrative centre. We were sent for. They were all sitting there in a semicircle in a room dominated by the picture of a very much decorated white officer – President Alfonso Lopez of Colombia. One of these gentlemen made Clousiot sit down, speaking to him in French; the rest of us remained standing. A thin, hook-nosed party in the middle who wore half-glasses began questioning me. The interpreter interpreted none of it but said to me, 'The man who has just spoken and who is going to interrogate you is the magistrate of the town of Rio Hacha; the others are prominent citizens, friends of his. I'm a Haitian, and I look after the electricity in these parts: I act as interpreter. I believe some of the people here understand a little French, though they don't say so. Maybe even the magistrate.'

This preamble made the magistrate impatient, and he broke in with his interrogation in Spanish. The Haitian translated the questions and answers as they came.

'Are you French?'

'Yes.'

'Where do you come from?'

'Curaçao.'

'And before that?'

'Trinidad.'

'And before that?'

'Martinique.'

'You're lying. More than a week ago our consul in Curaçao was warned that the coast should be watched because six men who had escaped from the French penal settlement were going to try to land in our country.'

'All right. We did escape from the penal settlement.'

'You're a Cayenero, then?'

'Yes.'

'If so noble a country as France sent you so far and punished you so severely, it must be because you are very dangerous malefactors.'

'Maybe.'

'Theft or murder?'

'Manslaughter.'

'Killing – it's all one. So you are matadors, then? Where are the other three?'

'They stayed in Curaçao.'

'You're lying again. You landed them thirty-five miles from here in a region called Castillette. Fortunately they have been arrested and they'll be here in a few hours. Did you steal the boat?'

'No. The Bishop of Curaçao gave it us as a present.'

'All right. You'll stay in prison here until the governor has made up his mind what is to be done with you. For the crime of landing three of your accomplices on Colombian territory and then trying to put out to sea again, I sentence you, the captain of the vessel, to three months imprisonment, and the other two to one month. You had better behave, if you don't want the police to inflict corporal punishment – they are very severe men. Have you anything to say?'

'No. I should just like to collect my belongings and the stores aboard the boat.'

'That's all confiscated by the customs, except for one pair of trousers, one shirt, one jacket and a pair of shoes for each man. All the rest is confiscated, so don't make a fuss. There's nothing to be said – it's the law.'

Everyone went out into the courtyard. The wretched local prisoners clustered round the magistrate, clamouring 'Doctor, Doctor!' He pushed right through them, swollen with his own importance, neither replying nor stopping. They walked out of the prison and disappeared.

At one o'clock our three friends arrived in a lorry, with seven or eight armed men. They got out, carrying their suitcases and looking thoroughly downcast. We went back indoors with them.

'What a bloody awful mistake we made – and made you make,' said the Breton. 'There's nothing to be said for us, Papillon. If you want to kill me, go right ahead: I shan't raise a finger. We aren't men: we're a set of pouffes. We did it because we were afraid of the sea. Well, after the glimpse I've had of Colombia and the Colombians, the perils of the sea are a fun-fair compared with the perils of being in the hands of these buggers. Was it because there was no wind they copped you?'

'That's right, Breton. There's no call for me to kill anyone.'

we all got it wrong. All I had to do was to refuse to land you and nothing would have happened.'

'You're too good, Papi.'

'No. I'm fair, that's all.' I told them about the interrogation. 'So in the end maybe the governor will let us go.'

'Bloody likely. Still, let's hope, since hope is what keeps you going, as the guy said in the story.'

As I saw it the authorities of this half-civilized hole could not decide upon our case. It was only much higher up that it would be laid down whether we could stay in Colombia, or whether we were to be handed back to France, or whether we should be put back in our boat to go farther off. It would be hellish unjust if these people were to take the worst decision, for after all we had done them no harm and we hadn't committed the slightest crime in their country.

We had been here a week now. No change of any kind apart from some talk of sending us under strong guard to a larger town called Santa Marta, a hundred and twenty-five miles away. These savage, piratical-looking police had not changed their attitude towards us. Yesterday I was on the very edge of being shot by one, just for having snatched my soap back from him in the wash-house. We were still in this room stiff with mosquitoes, but fortunately it was rather cleaner than the way we found it, thanks to Maturette and the Breton scrubbing it out every day. I began to despair, to lose confidence. These Colombians, this mixed race of Indians and Negroes, and Indians and the Spaniards who were once masters here, made me feel like giving up. A Colombian prisoner lent me an old Santa Marta paper. On the front page there were photos of us six and the police-captain underneath, wearing his huge felt hat and with a cigar in his mouth. And there was a picture of nine or ten police all armed with their rifles too. I gathered that the whole thing had been jazzed up and their part in it made much more dramatic. Anyone would have thought the whole of Colombia had been preserved from some terrible danger by our arrest. And yet the picture of the villains was pleasanter to look at than the one of the police. The villains really looked quite like decent people, whereas the police - oh, pardon me! You had only to look at the captain and your mind was made up. What were we to do? I began to learn a few words of Spanish. Escape, fugarse; prisoner, preso; kill, matar; chain, cadena; handcuffs, esposas; man, hombre; woman, mujer.

The Break from Rio Hacha

I made friends with a guy in the courtyard who wore handcuffs all the time. We smoked the same cigar; it was long, thin and terribly strong, but at least it was a smoke. I gathered he was a smuggler working between Venezuela and the island of Aruba. He was accused of having killed some coastguards and he was awaiting his trial. Some days he was wonderfully calm and then on others he would be all on edge and nervous. Finally I noticed that the calm days were when he chewed some leaves he was brought. One day he gave me half of one of these leaves and straight-away I understood what it was all about. My tongue, palate and lips lost all feeling. These were the leaves of the coca plant. He was a man of thirty-five; his arms were hairy and his chest was covered with a mat of very black curly fur; he must have been most uncommonly strong. There was such a layer of thick horny skin on the soles of his bare feet that I often saw him pull out bits of glass or a nail which had gone right in without reaching the flesh.

'Fuga, you and me,' I said to the smuggler one afternoon. Once when the Haitian had come to see me I had asked him for a French-Spanish dictionary. The smuggler got my meaning and with a gesture he showed me he'd certainly like to escape, but what about the handcuffs? They were American handcuffs with a ratchet. They had a slot for the key, and the key must certainly be of the flat sort. With a piece of wire, flattened at the end, the Breton made me a hook. After several tries I could open my new friend's handcuffs whenever I wanted. He spent the night by himself in a calabozo (cell) whose bars were fairly thick. In ours they were thin, and they could be bent for sure. So there would be only one bar to saw through — one of those in Antonio's cell (the Colombian was called Antonio). 'How can we get a sacette (saw)?' 'Plata (money).' 'Cuanto (how much)?' 'A hundred pesos.' 'Dollars?' 'Ten.' To cut it short, he got two hacksaw blades with the ten dollars I gave him. Drawing on the ground in the yard I showed him how he was to mix the metal sawdust with the cooked rice they gave us and carefully cover up the slit every time he had sawed any depth. At the last moment, just before we all went in for the night, I used to open one of his handcuffs. In case they were checked, all he had to do was to push on it for it to shut automatically. He took three nights to saw through the bar. He told me he could finish the cut in under a minute and that he was sure he could bend it over with his hands. He was to come and fetch me.

It often rained, and he said that the 'primera noche de lluvia (the first rainy night)' he would come. That very night it started pouring down. My friends knew what I was up to: not one of them wanted to accompany me, because they thought the region I meant to go to was too far. I wanted to reach the tip of the Colombian peninsula on the Venezuelan frontier. Our map showed this part under the name of Goajira, and said it was disputed territory, neither Colombian nor Venezuelan. The Colombian said that 'eso es la tierra de los Indios (this was Indian country)' and that there were no police in those parts, neither Colombian nor Venezuelan. Just a few smugglers passed through. It was dangerous, because the Goajira Indians would not allow a civilized man into their country. The farther inland, the more dangerous they were. There were fishing Indians on the coast, and these ones traded with the village of Castillette and a hamlet called La Vela through some rather more civilized Indians. Antonio himself didn't want to go there. Either he or his friends had killed some Indians during a battle that was fought when a boat filled with contraband took refuge on their coast by force one day. But Antonio undertook to lead me very near to Goajira, and after that I was to go on alone. I don't have to tell you how tedious it was, working all this out, because he used words that weren't in the dictionary.

So that night it was pouring with rain. There I was, standing near the window. Long before this a plank had been wrenched free from the bed-platform: we were going to use it as a lever to force the bars apart. We had made a trial two nights before, and we had seen they gave easily.

'Listo (ready).' Antonio's face appeared, stuck between the bars. Helped by Maturette and the Breton, I not only wrenched the bar aside with a single heave, but even unseated its bottom end. They shoved me up, and before I vanished they slapped my buttocks hard. This was my friends' good-bye. We were in the yard. The torrential rain made a hellish din as it thundered down on the corrugated iron roofs. Antonio took me by the hand and led me to the wall. Getting over it was child's play - it was only six feet high. Nevertheless I cut my hand on one of the bits of glass on top: it was nothing - let's go. Antonio, that phenomenon, could somehow guide himself through the downpour that prevented us from seeing anything ten feet away. He made the most of it and went right through the village itself; then we took a road between the bush and the coast. Very late that night we saw a light. We had to make a long detour through the bush before coming back to the road - fortunately it was not very thick. We walked on through the rain until daybreak. When we set out he had given me a coca-leaf and I chewed on it just as I had seen him do in prison. I was not at all tired when daylight came. Was it the leaf? It certainly was. We went on walking in spite of the light. From time to time he lay down and set his ear to the streaming ground. And then we'd go on again.

He had an odd way of getting along. It was neither running nor walking, but in a series of little jumps one after another, all the same length, with his arms out as though he was rowing through the air. He must have heard something, because he pulled me into the bush. It was still raining. And true enough, before our eyes there appeared a roller pulled by a tractor, to flatten the earth on the road, no doubt.

Half past ten in the morning. The rain had stopped and the sun had come out. We went into the bush after having walked nearly a mile on the grass and not on the road. We lay there under a very thick tuft, surrounded by dense, thorny vegetation: it seemed to me we had nothing to fear, and yet Antonio wouldn't let me smoke or even talk in a whisper. As Antonio swallowed the juice of his leaves all the time, I did the same, only rather less. He had a bag with more than twenty in it, and he showed it to me. His splendid teeth shone in the shadow as he laughed. There were mosquitoes everywhere, so he chewed a cigar and with spit full of nicotine we daubed our faces and hands. After that they left us in peace. Seven in the evening. Night had fallen but there was too much moon lighting the road. He pointed to nine o'clock on my watch and said 'lluvia (rain).' I grasped that at nine o'clock it was going to rain. And in fact at nine o'clock it did rain and we set off again. So as not to keep him back I learnt the knack of skipping along and rowing with my arms. It was not difficult, and without actually running I still got along faster than a quick walk. During the night we had to go into the bush three times to let a car, a lorry and a little cart pulled by two asses go by. Thanks to the coca-leaves I did not feel at all tired when day broke. The rain stopped at eight o'clock and then we did the same thing all over again - about a mile on the grass and then into the bush to hide. The awkward thing about these leaves was that they prevented you from sleeping. We had not had a wink since the beginning of the break. Antonio's pupils were so dilated that there was no iris left. No doubt mine were the same.

Nine in the evening. It was raining. Anyone would have said the rain waited for this time of night to start. Later on I learnt that in the tropics, when it starts raining at such and such a time, it'll go on doing so until the change of the moon - it'll start at that time and stop at just the same time too. When we began walking that night we heard voices and we saw lights. 'Castillette,' said Antonio. Without any hesitation this phenomenon took me by the hand; we went back into the bush, and after more than two hours of hard going we hit the road once more. We marched, or rather bounded along all the rest of that night and a good deal of the next morning. The sun dried our clothes on us. It was three days now that we had been soaked, and three days since we had eaten anything apart from a lump of brown sugar the first day. Antonio seemed almost certain we shouldn't meet with any evilly-disposed people now. He went along quite care-free, and it was hours since he had put his ear to the ground. Here the road ran along by the shore. Antonio cut himself a branch; we left the road and walked along the wet sand. Antonio stopped to look closely at a broad flattened track on the beach; it was about two feet wide and it ran up out of the sea to the dry sand. We followed it and reached a place where the track spread out into a circle. Antonio thrust his stick in. When he pulled it out there was something yellow sticking to it, like the yolk of an egg. I helped him make a hole, digging the sand away with our hands, and there indeed were eggs, three or four hundred - I can't tell how many. They were turtle eggs. They had no shells, only a skin. Antonio took off his shirt and we filled it full, maybe a hundred of them. We left the beach and crossed the road to hide in the bush. When we were quite hidden we began eating - the yolks only, as Antonio showed me. He ripped the skin with his wolfish teeth, let the white run out and then swallowed the yolk: one for him, one for me. He opened a great many, always one for him and one for me. When we had eaten to the point of bursting we both lay down, rolling up our jackets for pillows. Antonio said, 'Mañana tu sigues solo dos días más. De mañana en adelante no hay policías (Tomorrow you go on by yourself for two more days. From tomorrow on there will be no more police).'

At ten that evening, the last frontier post. We recognized it by the barking of the dogs and by a little house stuffed with lights. Antonio avoided it all with wonderful skill. Then we went on all night without taking any precautions whatsoever. It was not a wide road; indeed it was not much more than a track; but you felt it was quite well used, because there was absolutely no grass growing on it. This path was about two feet across, and it ran along the edge of the bush, some six feet above the shore; and here and there you could see the marks of horses' or asses' hoofs. Antonio sat down on a broad root and motioned to me to sit down too. The sun was beating down good and hard. According to my watch it was eleven o'clock, but by the sun it must have been noon - a twig pushed into the ground made no shadow at all. So noon it was, and I altered my watch accordingly. Antonio emptied his bag of coca-leaves. There were seven of them. He gave me four and kept three. I went a little way into the bush and came back with a hundred and fifty Trinidad dollars and sixty florins and held them out to him. He stared at me with great astonishment and touched the notes: he couldn't understand how they could look so new or how they had never got wet, since he had never seen me drying them. He thanked me, holding all the notes in his hand: he thought for a long while and then took six five-florin notes - that is thirty florins altogether - and gave me back the rest. I pressed him, but he would not accept any more. At this point something changed in his mind. It had been decided that we were going to part here, but now he looked as though he was going to stay with me for another day. I understood him to say that after that he would turn back. Right. When we had swallowed a few more egg-yolks and lit a cigar – it took more than half an hour of beating two stones together to kindle a little dry moss – we set off once more.

We had been going three hours when we reached a long straight piece of path, and there, coming directly towards us, was a man on a horse. He was wearing a huge straw hat and long boots, no trousers, but a kind of leather slip, a green shirt and a faded jacket, a more or less military jacket; and that was green too. For weapons he had a very fine rifle and an enormous revolver in his belt.

'Caramba! Antonio, hijo mio (my son)!' Antonio had recognized the horseman from a great way off; he hadn't said anything to me, but it was perfectly obvious. The big copper-coloured guy – he was at least forty – got down from his horse and they thumped one another's shoulders. Later I often came across this way of embracing.

'Who's this?'

'Compañero de fuga (fellow-escaper). A Frenchman.'

'Where are you going?'

'As near as possible to the fishing Indians. He wants to go through the Indian country so as to get into Venezuela. There he means to find some way of going back to Curaçao or Aruba.'

'Goajira Indian bad,' said the man. 'You are not armed. Toma (take this).' He gave me a dagger with a polished horn handle and its leather sheath. We sat down at the edge of the path. I took off my shoes: my feet were all bloody. Antonio and the horseman spoke fast; it was clear they didn't like my idea of going through Goajira. Antonio made a sign that I was to get on to the horse: with my shoes hung over my shoulder my feet could stay bare and my wounds would dry. He conveyed all this to me by gestures. The horseman mounted, Antonio shook my hand, and before I had grasped what was happening there I was astride the horse, galloping off behind Antonio's friend. We galloped all that day and all that night. From time to time we stopped and he would pass me a bottle of anis: each time I drank a little. At daybreak he reined in.

The sun rose: he gave me a piece of cheese as hard as a stone and two biscuits, six leaves of coca and (as a present) a special waterproof bag to carry them in, hung from one's belt. He clasped me in his arms, thumping my shoulders as I had seen him do with Antonio, got on to his horse again and galloped off at full speed.

The Indians

I walked until one in the afternoon. There was no more bush, not so much as a single tree on the horizon. The brilliant sea glittered under a blazing sun. I walked barefoot with my shoes still slung over my left shoulder. Just when I had made up my mind to lie down it seemed to me that I could make out five or six trees or perhaps rocks, lying well back from the shore. I tried to judge the distance: six miles, maybe. I picked out a large half-leaf, and chewing it I set off again, going quite fast. An hour later I could see what these things were for sure - huts with roofs thatched either with straw or light-brown leaves. Smoke was coming out of one of them. Then I saw people. They had seen me. One group was waving and calling out in the direction of the sea: I could hear and see them plainly. And now I saw four boats coming in fast and about ten men getting out of them. Everybody was gathered in front of the huts, looking towards me. I could clearly see that the men and women were naked, wearing only something that hung down to hide their private parts. I walked slowly towards them. There were three men leaning on their bows, and they had arrows in their hands. Not a movement, either of friendship or of enmity. A barking dog came rushing furiously out at me. It bit me low down on the calf, carrying away a piece of my trousers. As it was coming in to attack me again it was hit behind by a little arrow that came from I couldn't tell where (later I learnt it was a blow-pipe); it fled howling.

and seemed to go into one of the houses. I came nearer, thinking, for it had bitten me badly. Now I was no more than ten yards from the group. Not one of them had stirred or spoken: the children stood behind their mothers. They had splendid ~~unscarred~~ naked bodies, the colour of copper. The women had high, thin, jutting-out breasts with huge tips. Only one had a heavy, sagging bosom.

The attitude of one of the men was so noble, his features were so clear-cut and he was so obviously of a superior kind that I went straight towards him. He had neither bow nor arrows. He was the same height as me; his hair was carefully cut with a heavy fringe at the level of his eyebrows. His hair hid his ears, for at the back it came down as far as their lobes; it was as black as jet, almost purple. Iron-grey eyes. No hair on his chest nor on his arms nor on his legs. Strong, muscular thighs and well-turned, delicate, copper-coloured legs. His feet were bare. Three yards from him, I stopped. He took two paces forward and looked me full in the face. The inspection lasted two minutes. Not the least movement on his visage - it was like a copper statue with almond eyes. Then he smiled and touched me on the shoulder. And now everybody came and touched me, and a young Indian woman took me by the hand and led me into the shade of one of the huts. There she pushed up the leg of my trousers. Everyone sat down in a circle round us. A man held me out a lit cigar; I took it and began to smoke. My way of smoking made them all burst out laughing; for with them both men and women smoke with the lit end inside their mouths. The wound was no longer bleeding, but a piece about half the size of a five-franc piece had been taken out. The young woman plucked out the hairs, and when everything was quite bare she washed the place with sea water that a little Indian girl had gone to fetch. At the same time she squeezed to make it bleed. She was not satisfied with the result, so she took a piece of sharpened iron and scraped each hole, widening it. I did my best not to flinch, because everybody was watching. Another Indian girl wanted to help, but mine thrust her back violently. Everyone laughed at this, and I grasped that she had meant to show the other one that I was her exclusive property: that was why everyone was so amused. Then she cut off the legs of my trousers well above the knee. Someone brought her seaweed: she prepared it on a stone, put it on to the wound and bound it there with strips torn from my trousers. She was pleased with her work, and she motioned me to get up.

I rose, taking off my jacket. As I did so, she saw the butterfly tattooed low on my back – it showed in the opening of my shirt. She looked closely, and then finding other tattoos she took my shirt off herself to see them better. All of them, men and women too, were deeply interested in the designs on my chest: on the right, a soldier of a punishment-battalion; on the left, a woman's face; on my stomach, a tiger's head; on my backbone, a big crucified sailor; and right across the lower part of my back, a tiger-hunt with hunters, palm-trees, elephants and tigers. When they saw these tattoos the men pushed the women aside, and carefully, slowly, they touched and inspected each design. When the chief had spoken, all the others gave their opinion. From that moment on the men adopted me for good. The women had done so from the moment the chief smiled and touched my shoulder.

We went into the biggest of the huts, and at the sight of it I was completely taken aback. The hut was made of brick-red beaten earth. It had eight doors: it was round, and in an inner corner brilliantly striped pure wool hammocks were hanging from the beams. In the middle there was a round, flat, brown, polished stone, and round it, other flat stones for sitting on. Against the wall, several double-barrelled guns, a military sword, and bows of every size hanging all over the place. I also noticed a turtle-shell so huge that a man could lie down in it; and a very well-built dry-stone chimney – no mortar at all. A table with half a calabash standing on it, and in the calabash two or three handfuls of pearls. They gave me a drink in a wooden bowl – it was fermented fruit-juice, bitter-sweet and very good. Then, on a banana leaf, they brought me a big fish; it must have weighed at least five pounds, and it had been cooked on the embers. I was invited to eat, and I ate slowly. When I had finished the delicious fish the young woman took me and led me to the beach, where I washed my hands and rinsed my mouth with sea-water. Then we went back again. We sat in a circle, the young woman next to me with her hand on my thigh, and with gestures and words we tried to exchange a certain amount of information about ourselves.

All at once the chief got up, went to the back of the hut, returned with a piece of white stone and drew on the table. First the naked Indians and their village, and then the sea. On the right of the Indian village, houses with windows and men and women wearing clothes. The men had either a rifle or a stick in their hands. On the left, another village, and ugly-looking brutes with rifles and hats: women in dresses. When I had carefully looked at the drawings he noticed he had forgotten something and he drew a road leading to the other village on the left. To show me how they lay with regard to his own village, he drew a sun on the Venezuelan side, on the right, a round circle with rays coming out of it all over, and on the side of the Colombian village another sun with a wavy line cutting it at the horizon. There was no mistaking him: on one side the sun was rising and on the other it was setting. The young chief gazed proudly at his work, and everybody looked at it in turn. When he saw that I had thoroughly understood what he meant, he took the chalk and drew criss-cross lines all over the two villages: only his own remained untouched. I understood that he meant to convey that people of the other villages were wicked, that he wanted to have nothing to do with them, and that only his village was good. As if he had to tell me that!

He wiped the table with a wet rag. When it was dry he put the piece of chalk into my hand, and now it was up to me to tell my story in pictures. It was harder than his. I drew a man with his hands tied and two armed men looking at him; then the same man running and the two others chasing him and aiming with their guns. I drew the same scene three times, but each time I was a little farther away from the men after me, and in the last drawing the police had stopped and I was still running in the direction of their village, which I drew with the Indians and the dog, and in front of them all the chief holding out his arms towards me.

My drawing can't have been so bad, because after a good deal of talking among the men the chief held out his arms like in the drawing. They had got my meaning.

That same night the Indian girl took me to her hut, where six women and four men were living. She slung a splendid striped woollen hammock, so broad that two could easily lie in it sideways. I got into it, but long-ways; and seeing that she got into another crossways, I did the same and she came and lay down next to me. She felt my body, ears, eyes and mouth with her long, thin but very rough-skinned fingers, all scarred — delicate, but wrinkled. They were the cuts from the coral when she dived for pearl-oysters. When in my turn I stroked her face she took my hand, and she was amazed to find it smooth and unhorny. After this hour in the hammock we got up and went back to the chief's great hut. They gave me the guns to look at – twelve and sixteen bores from Saint-Etienne. They had six boxes of cartridges.

The Indian girl was medium-sized and she had the same grey eyes as the chief; she had a very clean-cut profile and her plaited hair, parted in the middle, came down to her hips. She had beautifully-formed breasts, high and pear-shaped. Their tips were darker than her copper skin, and very long. By way of kissing, she nibbled: she didn't know how to kiss. I very soon taught her how it was done in the civilized world. When we walked, she would not go at my side: there was nothing to be done about it – she insisted on walking behind. One of the huts had nobody in it, and it was in poor repair. With the other women to help her, she fixed the coconut-leaf roof and patched the walls with dollops of very sticky red earth. The men had all kinds of edged tools and weapons – knives, daggers, machetes, axes, hoes and an iron-pronged fork. They had copper and aluminium saucepans, watering-cans, iron pots, a grindstone, an oven, and metal and wooden barrels. Extraordinarily big hammocks made of pure wool and decorated with plaited fringes and with very strongly coloured patterns – blood-red, Prussian blue, shining black and canary-yellow. Presently the house was finished and she began bringing in the things the other Indians gave her, such as an iron tripod to go over the fire, a hammock big enough for four grown-ups lying sideways, glasses, tin pots, saucepans and even an ass's harness.

We had been caressing one another for the fortnight I had been there, but she savagely refused to go all the way. I couldn't understand, for it was she who excited me and then just when everything was set up she wouldn't. She never put on a stitch of clothing apart from her loincloth, which had a very thin string round her slender waist, leaving her bottom quite bare. We set up house in the hut without the least ceremony: it had three doors, the main one in the middle of the round and the other two opposite one another. In the circle of the round house, these doors formed an isosceles triangle. Each had its own function: I was always supposed to come in and go out of the northern one. And she was always supposed to go out and come in by the southern one. I was not to go in or out of hers, and she was not to use mine. Friends came in or went out by the main door, and neither she nor I could come in by it unless we had visitors with us.

It was only when we had settled in the house that she gave herself to me. I don't want to go into the details, but by instinct she made fiery and wonderfully skilful love, winding round me like a tropical creeper. When we were by ourselves, absolutely alone, I combed and plaited her hair. She was very happy when I did this; her face showed the most wonderful delight and yet at the same time fear in case anyone should see us. For I gathered that a man was not supposed to comb his woman's hair, nor smooth her hands with a stone like pumice, nor kiss her on the mouth or breasts in a certain way.

So there we were, Lali and me (Lali was her name), settled in this house. One thing surprised me very much, and that was that she never used iron or aluminium saucepans or frying-pans nor ever drank out of a glass; she did everything in the earthenware pots they made themselves. The watering-can was used for washing with, under the rose. The ocean was our lavatory.

I was there when the oysters were opened to be searched for pearls. The oldest of the women did this job. Every girl who went pearl-diving had her own bag. The pearls they found were divided like this - one share for the chief as the representative of the tribe; one for the fisherman; half a share for the oyster-opener; and a share and a half for the diving-girl. If she lived with her family, she gave her pearls to her uncle, her father's brother. I never understood why it was that it was also the uncle who first came into the house of a couple about to be married, took the girl's arm and put it round the man's waist and then the man's right arm, wrapping it round the girl's waist so that the forefinger went into her navel. Then, once that was done, he would go away.

So I was there when the oysters were opened; but I didn't go out fishing, because I had not been directly asked to get into a boat. They fished quite far from the shore, perhaps five hundred yards out. Some days Lali would come back with her ribs and thighs all scratched from the coral. The wounds bled sometimes, and then she would crush seaweed and rub it on the places. I never did anything unless they made signs, inviting me. I never went into the chief's house unless he or someone else led me in by the hand. Lali suspected that three Indian girls of her own age came and lay in the grass as near as possible to our door to try and see or hear what we did when we were alone.

Yesterday I saw the Indian who travelled between our village and the nearest Colombian settlement, about a mile from the frontier post. This village was called La Vela. The Indian had two donkeys and he carried a Winchester repeater; he never put on a stitch, apart from the loin-cloth everybody wore. He did not speak a word of Spanish: so how did he carry out his trade, then? With the help of the dictionary I wrote on a piece of paper agujas (needles), red and blue Indian ink, and sewing cotton, because the chief often asked me to tattoo him. This travelling Indian was small and wizened. He had a terrible wound on the upper part of his body that started at his lower ribs, went clean across and ended up on his right shoulder. In healing the wound had made a rolled scar as thick as your finger. The pearls were put into a cigar-box. The box was divided into compartments and the pearls went into them according to size. When the Indian left, the chief gave me permission to go a little way with him. So as to make me come back, in his simple-minded fashion he lent me a double-barrelled gun and six cartridges. That way he was sure I'd be forced to return, because he was quite certain I'd never carry off anything that didn't belong to me. As the asses were not loaded the Indian got on to one and I got on to the other. All day we travelled along the same path I had taken to come; but at about a mile or two from the frontier post the Indian turned his back to the sea and plunged inland.

Towards five o'clock we reached the edge of a stream where there stood five Indian houses. They all came out to look at me. The Indian talked and talked and talked until at last there appeared a character who had everything of an Indian – eyes, hair, features – except the colour. He was dead white, and he had the red eyes of an albino. He wore khaki trousers. And at this point I grasped that the Indian from my village never went farther than this place. The white Indian said to me, 'Buenos días (good day). Tu eres el matador que se fugó con Antonio? (are you the killer who escaped with Antonio?) Antonio es compadre mio de sangre (Antonio is my blood-brother).' To be blood-brothers two men tie their arms together, the one to the other, and then each runs his knife over the other's arm cutting into it. Then each smears the other's arm with his own blood, and each licks the other's blood-stained hand. 'Que quieres (What do you want)?'

'Agujas, tinta china roja y azul (Needles, and red and blue Indian ink). Nada más (Nothing else).'

'Tu lo tendrás de aquí a un cuarto de luna (You'll have them at the next quarter of the moon from now).'

He spoke Spanish better than I did and I had the impression he would know how to enter into contact with civilized men and organize barter, at the same time taking the greatest care of his own people's interests. Just as we were going he gave me a necklace made of very white Colombian silver coins: he said it was for Lali.

'Vuelva a verme (Come back and see me),' said the white Indian. To make sure I should return he gave me a bow.

I set off for the village again, but by myself; and I had not covered half the distance before I saw Lali, together with a young sister of hers - twelve or perhaps thirteen. Lali was certainly between sixteen and eighteen. She rushed at me furiously and scratched me, only getting at my chest, however, for I hid my face; and then she gave me a savage bite on the neck. Even using all my strength I found it hard to keep her off. Suddenly she calmed down. I put the younger girl on the donkey and I walked behind, my arm round Lali. Slowly we went back to the village. On the way I killed an owl. I fired without knowing what it was, just seeing these eyes glowing in the darkness. Lali insisted on taking it back, and she hung on the ass's saddle. We got home at dawn. I was so tired I just had to wash. Lali washed me, and then, there in front of me, took off her sister's loin-cloth and set about washing her. When she had finished she washed herself.

When they both came in again I was sitting there, waiting for the water to boil: I had put it on to have a hot lemon sugar drink. And now there happened something that I never understood until long after. Lali pushed her sister between my legs and put my arm round her waist: I noticed that the sister had no loin-cloth on and that she was wearing the necklace I had given Lali. I didn't know how to get out of this position, but I gently pulled the girl from between my arms, picked her up and put her to lie in the hammock. I took the necklace off her and passed it over Lali's head. Lali lay next to her sister and me next to Lali. Long after I learned Lali had thought I had been finding out how to get away because maybe I wasn't happy with her; and she had thought that perhaps her sister would be able to keep me there. When I woke up there were Lali's hands over my eyes. The little sister wasn't there any more: it was very late – eleven in the morning. Lali gazed lovingly at me with her big grey eyes and gently nibbled the corner of my mouth. She was happy to make me understand that she knew I loved her and that I was not going to leave just because she couldn't hold me.

The Indian who usually paddled Lali's canoe was sitting there in front of the house. I saw that he was waiting for her. He smiled at me and closed his eyes in very well-acted pantomime – his way of telling me he knew Lali was asleep. I sat down next to him; he said a good many things I couldn't understand. He was a young man, athletic and wonderfully muscular. He gazed at my tattoos for a long while, examining them, and then by signs he showed he'd like me to tattoo him. I nodded to say yes, but it seemed to me he thought I didn't know how. Lali appeared. She had covered herself all over with oil. She knew I didn't care for it, but she made me understand that in this cloudy weather the water would be very cold. Her mimicry, half laughing and half serious, was so pretty that I made her go through it several times, pretending not to be able to follow. When I made a sign that she was to begin again she put on a face that said as clearly as could be, 'Are you stupid, or is it that I'm torpe (dull) at explaining why I put on this oil?'

The chief went by with two Indian women. They were carrying a huge green lizard weighing at least ten or twelve pounds and he had his bow and arrows. He had just killed the lizard, and he invited me to come and eat it with him later. Lali spoke to him; he touched my shoulder, pointing to the sea. I gathered that I could go with Lali if I wanted to. We went off all three of us, Lali, her usual fishing companion and me. It was a very light little boat made of balsa wood, and it was easy to launch. They waded down carrying it on their shoulders and then plunged in. Getting it out to sea was an odd business: the man got in first, in the stern, holding a huge paddle. Lali, with the water up to her bosom, held the canoe steady and prevented it from being pushed back on shore; I got in and sat in the middle; and then in one movement there was Lali aboard and at the same instant the Indian dug in his paddle and sent us out. The rollers were higher and higher the farther we went from the shore. Five or six hundred yards out we found a kind of channel where two other boats were already fishing. Lali had tied her plaits close to her head with five red leather thongs, three across and two lengthways; the thongs themselves went round her neck. Carrying a stout knife in her hand, she went down the anchor, a thick iron bar weighing about thirty pounds that the man had lowered to the bottom. The boat stayed there at anchor, but it was never still, for it rose and fell with every roller.

For three hours and more Lali went up and down between the canoe and the bottom of the sea. The bottom could not be seen, but judging from the time she took, it must have been fifty and sixty feet down. Every time she brought oysters up in the sack the man emptied them into the canoe. During these three hours Lali never once got into the canoe. To rest, she clung to the side for five or ten minutes. We changed places twice without her getting in. In the second place the sack came up with more and bigger oysters. We turned back for the shore. Lali had got into the boat and the rollers soon ran us back to the beach. The old Indian woman was waiting there. Lali and I let her and the man carry the oysters up to the dry sand. When they were all ashore, Lali stopped the old woman from opening them: it was Lali herself who began. She quickly opened about thirty with the point of her knife before she found a pearl. I swallowed at least two dozen — that goes without saying: the water must have been cold down there, because their flesh was chilled. Gently she brought out a pearl, the size of one's little finger nail. It was a pearl nearer the larger than the medium size. How it gleamed! Nature had given it a wonderful variety of changing colours, none of them too pronounced. Lali took the pearl in her fingers, put it into her mouth, kept it there for a moment, and then, bringing it out, she put it into mine. With a mimic chewing she showed that she wanted me to crush it with my teeth and swallow it. At my first refusal she begged so prettily that I did what she wanted: I crushed the pearl between my teeth and I swallowed the fragments. She opened four or five oysters and gave them me to swallow, meaning the whole of the pearl to go down inside me. She pushed me back on the sand, and like a little girl she opened my mouth and looked to see whether there were any crumbs still there between my teeth.

We walked off, leaving the two others to get on with the work.

I had been here a month now. I couldn't get that wrong, because I noted the day and the date on a piece of paper every morning. I had had the needles for some time, as well as red, blue and violet Indian ink. In the chief's hut I found three Solingen razors. They were never used for shaving, since the Indians had no beard. One came in useful for the even trimming of their hair. I tattooed Zato, the chief, on the arm. I did him an Indian with different-coloured feathers in his hair. He was delighted, and he made me understand that I was not to tattoo anyone else until I had done him a big picture on the chest. He wanted the same tiger's head that I had, with long teeth. I laughed: I wasn't good enough at drawing to do such fine work. Lali took all the hair off my whole body. She could scarcely see a hair before she would pluck it out and rub me with seaweed, crushed and mixed with ash. It seemed to me the hairs did not grow so strongly after this.

This Indian tribe was called Goajira. They lived on the coast and on the inland plain as far as the beginning of the mountains. In the mountains there were other tribes called Motilones. Years afterwards, I came into contact with them. As I said, the Goajiras were in indirect touch with civilization through their barter. The ones on the coast gave the white Indian their pearls and also turtles. The turtles were supplied alive, and sometimes they reached a weight of three hundred and fifty pounds. They never came up to the weight and size of the Orinoco or Maroni turtles, which reached nearly nine hundred pounds and whose shell could be as much as six feet long and more than three across. Once they are turned on their backs, these turtles cannot get up again. I've seen them carried off still alive after having lain there on their backs for three weeks without eating or drinking. As for the big green lizards, they are very good to eat. Their white, tender flesh is delicious; and their eggs, cooked by the sun in the sand, are very good too. Only their appearance puts you off a little.

Every time Lali went fishing she brought back her share of the pearls and gave them to me. I put them into a wooden bowl without sorting them – big, medium and small all mixed. The only ones I set aside, putting them in an empty matchbox, were two pink pearls, three black, and seven of a wonderfully beautiful metallic grey. I also had a big irregular bean-shaped pearl, the size of one of our white or red haricots at home.

This baroque pearl had three colours one on top of the other, and according to the weather one would show more than the others – the black layer, the gunmetal or the silvery layer with its pinkish sheen. Thanks to these pearls and a few turtles, the tribe lacked for nothing. But they possessed some objects that were no use to them, while others they might have found valuable, were not there. For example, there wasn't a single mirror in the whole tribe. I had to find a square of nickel-plated metal, about eighteen inches across that no doubt came from a wreck, before I could shave or see myself.

My policy towards my friends was simple: I did nothing that could lessen the chief's authority or wisdom, still less that of a very old Indian who lived by himself two miles away inland, together with various snakes, two goats and a dozen sheep. He was the medicine-man for certain Goajira villages. This behaviour of mine meant that no one felt jealous of me or wished me away. By the end of two months I was completely adopted by one and all. The medicine-man also had a score of hens. Seeing that in the two hamlets I knew there were no goats nor hens nor sheep, it occurred to me that owning domestic animals must be a medicine-man's privilege. Every morning, each taking her turn, an Indian woman would set off with a plaited basket on her head, to carry him freshly-caught fish and seafood. They also took him maize cakes made that morning and roasted on stones in the fire. Sometimes, but not always, she would come back with eggs or sour milk. When the medicine-man wanted me to go and see him he sent three eggs for me personally and a highly-polished wooden knife. Lali went half of the way with me and then waited in the shade of a huge cactus. The first time she put the wooden knife in my hand and showed me I was to go in the direction she pointed out.

The old Indian lived in disgusting filth in a tent made of stretched cow-hides, the hairy side in. There were three stones in the middle with a fire that you felt must always be alight. He didn't sleep in a hammock but on a kind of bed made of branches, standing more than three feet high. It was quite a large tent – it must have covered twenty square yards. It had no walls, apart from a few branches on the windy side. I saw two snakes, the one ten feet long and as thick as your arm, and the other about three feet with a yellow V on its head; and I said to myself, 'Think of what those snakes must put leave. Lali kept watch on me all the time: she would have liked to see me enter more thoroughly into the life of the tribe. For example, she had seen me go out to catch fish, and she knew I could paddle well and handle the little light canoe with great skill; so it was no time before she wanted me to be the one who managed the canoe for the pearl fishing. But the idea didn't suit me at all. Lali was the best diving-girl in the whole village. It was always her boat that brought back the best and biggest oysters — that is to say, those that had been found in the deepest water. I also knew that the young Indian who paddled her canoe was the chief's brother. If I were to go with Lali, it would be against his interests; so that was something I shouldn't do. When Lali saw I was pensive she went off to fetch her sister again. She came running, quite delighted, and used my door to come in by. This must have had an important meaning. That is to say, they both appeared together in front of the main door, the one facing the sea, and there they separated, Lali going round to her door and Zoraïma, the little one, to mine. Zoraïma's breasts were hardly the size of tangerines and her hair was quite short. It was cut square at chin level, and her fringe came down lower than her brows — almost to her eyes. Every time her sister brought her like this, they both bathed and when they came in they took off their loin-cloths and hung them up on the hammock. The younger one always went off very sad because I wouldn't have her. One day, when we were all three lying there, with Lali in the middle, she got up and then got in again leaving me pressed tight against Zoraïma's naked body.

Lali's fishing companion hurt his knee — a very deep, wide gash. He was carried to the medicine-man and came back with a white clay plaster over it. So that morning I went fishing with Lali. We launched the canoe just as usual, and everything went very well. I took her out rather farther than she generally went. Lali was perfectly delighted at having me in the canoe with her. Before diving she rubbed herself all over with oil. I reflected that down there — and the bottom was black as far as I could see — it must be very cold. Three sharks' fins passed quite close to us and I pointed them out; she didn't think they mattered in the least. It was ten o'clock in the morning, and the sun was shining. With her bag rolled round her left arm and her sheathed knife tight in her belt, she dived; and she did so without pushing the boat with her feet as an ordinany person would have done. She vanished downwards, towards the dark bottom, with extraordinary speed. Her first dive must have been just to explore, because there were few oysters in the sack when she came up. An idea occurred to me. There was a bundle of leather thongs aboard: I put a hitch round the sack, handed it back to Lali and paid out the thongs as she went down, taking the line with her. She must have understood the operation, because after a longish pause she came up again without the sack. She hung there to rest after this long dive and she made a sign that I was to pull it up. I heaved steadily, but at one point it caught, having fouled the coral. She dived and disentangled it: it came up half full and I emptied it into the canoe. In the course of that morning in eight fifty-foot dives we almost filled the canoe. When she got in again the gunwale was only two inches above the surface. We were so full of oysters that hauling up the anchor put us in danger of sinking. So I untied the anchor-rope and made it fast to the paddle, which would float there until we went back for it. We landed without any trouble.

The old woman was waiting for us and Lali's Indian was sitting there on the dry sand just where they always opened the oysters they had fished up. To begin with he was pleased we had brought in so many. Lali seemed to be explaining how I had tied the sack to the line, which made it easier for her to come up and also allowed her to put more oysters in. He looked carefully at my double hitch for holding the sack, and at the first try he tied it again perfectly. Then he looked at me, very proud of himself.

When the old woman opened the oysters, she found thirteen pearls. Usually Lali never stayed for this part of the job but waited for her share to be brought to her at home; but today she stayed until the last one was finished. I ate at least three dozen, and Lali ate five or six. The old woman divided out the shares. The pearls were all more or less the same size, about as big as a good pea. She put three aside for the chief, then three for me, two for her, and five for Lali. Lali took the three and gave them to me. I took them and handed them to the wounded Indian. He didn't want to take them, but I opened his hand and closed it over the pearls. Then he accepted them. His wife and daughter had been silently watching from a distance; at this they burst out laughing and came to help me help carry the Indian to his hut.

This scene was repeated for close on a fortnight. Every time, I handed over the pearls to the fisherman. Yesterday I kept one for myself, one out of the six that came to my share. When we got home I made Lali eat it. She was wild with delight and she sang all that afternoon. From time to time I went to see the white Indian. He told me to call him Zorrillo, which means little fox in Spanish. He told me the chief had asked him to ask me why I didn't tattoo the tiger's head for him, and I explained it was because I couldn't draw well enough. With the help of the dictionary I asked him to bring me a mirror with a surface as big as my chest, some transparent paper, a fine brush and a bottle of ink, and some carbon paper. Or if he couldn't get carbon paper, then a thick, very soft pencil. I also told him to bring me clothes of my size and to leave them at his place, together with three khaki shirts. I learnt that the police had questioned him about Antonio and me. He'd told them that I had crossed the mountains into Venezuela and that Antonio had died of a snake bite. Zorrillo also knew that the Frenchmen were in prison at Santa Marta.

In Zorrillo's house there was just the same mixture of things as I had seen in the chief's hut – a whole pile of earthenware pots decorated with the patterns the Indians loved, very artistic pots, both in their shapes and in their patterns and colours; splendid pure wool hammocks; some quite white and others coloured and fringed; the tanned skins of snakes, lizards and huge bull-frogs; baskets, some woven of white creepers and others of coloured. He told me that all these things were made by Indians of the same race as my tribe, but living in the forest, far inland, twenty-five days' march into the bush from here. That was where the coca-leaves that he gave me came from. He gave me more than twenty: whenever I felt low I was to chew one. When I left Zorrillo I asked him to get me all the things I had written down, and if he could some papers and magazines in Spanish, for with my dictionary I had learnt a lot in these two months. He had no news of Antonio: he only knew there had been another clash between coastguards and smugglers. Five coastguards and one smuggler had been killed and the boat had not been taken. I had never seen a drop of alcohol in the village, apart from that fermented fruit-juice stuff. Noticing a bottle of anis I asked him to give it to me. He wouldn't. If I liked I could drink it there, but not take it away. He was a wise man, that albino.

I left Zorrillo and went off on an ass he'd lent me - it would go home of its own accord the next day. The only things I took with me were a big bag of different-coloured sweets, each wrapped in thin paper, and sixty packets of cigarettes. Lali was waiting for me about two miles from the village, with her sister; she made no scene of any kind and consented to walk beside me, arm in arm. Now and then she stopped and kissed me on the lips in the civilized way. When we got there I went to see the chief and gave him the sweets and the cigarettes. We sat in front of the door, facing the sea. We drank the fermented stuff, cool out of its earthenware jars. Lali sat on my right with her arms round my thigh, and her sister in the same position on my left. They sucked away at the sweets. The bag was open there in front of us, and the women and children quietly helped themselves. The chief pushed Zoraima's head towards mine and made me understand that she wanted to be my woman like Lali. Lali held her breasts in her hands and then pointed to Zoraima's little bosom to show that that was the reason I didn't want her. I shrugged and everybody laughed. I could see Zoraima was very miserable. I smoked a few cigarettes: the Indians tried them but soon threw them away and returned to their cigars, the lighted end inside their mouths. When I had said good-bye to everyone I went, taking Lali by the arm. But she would walk behind me and Zoraima followed. We cooked some large fish over the embers - that was always a treat. And I broiled a five-pound crayfish in the hot ashes; it was a delight to eat its tender flesh.

of the hut. She groaned a little but her body, all taut with pleasure, clasped me tight and would not let me go. Gently I disentangled myself and went to bathe in the sea, for I was all covered with earth: she came after me and we bathed together. I washed her back and she washed my legs and arms, and then we returned to the house together. Lali was sitting just where we had lain and when we came in she understood what had happened. She got up, put her arms round my neck and kissed me lovingly, and then she took her sister by the arm and made her go out by my door. Lali turned round and went out by hers. I heard knocking outside and when I went out I found Lali, Zoraïma and two other women trying to make a hole in the wall with an iron bar. I gathered that they were going to make a fourth door. So that it should not crack except where they wanted it too, they were wetting it with the watering-can. Presently the door was made. Zoraïma pushed the rubble out: from now on she alone would come and go by this opening - never again would she use mine.

The chief came with three other Indians and his brother, whose leg was almost healed. He looked at the drawing on the mirror and he looked at his own reflection. He was astonished at seeing the tiger so well drawn and at the sight of his own face. He did not understand what I meant to do. When everything was dry, I put the glass on the table with tracing-paper over it and I began copying. This was very easy and it went fast - the pencil ran accurately along all the lines. Before the interested gaze of all present, I produced a drawing as perfect as the original in under half an hour. One after the other they all took the sheet and inspected it, comparing the tiger on my chest with the one on the paper. I made Lali lie on the table, wetted her just a little with a damp cloth, put a piece of carbon-paper on her belly and then the sheet I had just drawn on over it. I drew a few strokes, and when they saw a small part of the drawing reproduced on Lali's skin they were all utterly amazed. It was only then that the chief grasped that it was for him I was taking all this trouble.

Human beings who do not have the hypocrisy of a civilized upbringing react naturally, as soon as they understand what is going on. It's in the living present that they're pleased or angry, happy or sad, concerned or indifferent. There is a striking superiority about pure-blooded Indians like these Goajiras. They outdo us in everything; if once they have adopted someone, everything they posses is his; and if he does the least thing for them, their very quick feelings are extraordinarily moved. I decided to trace the main outlines with a razor so that from the first sitting the chief features should be there, fixed for good in tattoo. I'd go over it all again afterwards, with three needles fixed in a little stick. The next day I began my work.

Zato lay on the table. When I had traced the drawing on a stronger piece of white paper I transferred it to his skin, which I had already prepared with a white clay wash that had been allowed to harden. It all came out quite perfect, and I let it dry thoroughly. The chief lay there stretched stiffly on the table, neither wincing nor even moving his head, so afraid was he of spoiling the picture, which I showed him in the mirror. I began on the lines with the razor. There was very little blood and each time a little showed I wiped it away at once. When I had gone over the whole thing very thoroughly, so that the drawing was replaced by thin red lines, I daubed his entire chest with blue ink. The blood prevented the ink taking only in the places where I had gone a little too deep, but almost all the picture stood out wonderfully. A week later Zato had his open-mouthed tiger's head with its pink tongue, white teeth and black eyes, nose and whiskers. I was pleased with my work: it was better than my own tattoo and its colours were livelier. When the scabs came off I went over some places again with the needles. Zato was so pleased he asked Zorrillo to get six more looking-glasses, one for each hut and two for his.

Days, weeks and months went by. We were in April, and now I had been here four months. My health was splendid. I was strong, and now that I was used to going barefoot I could go great distances without getting tired, hunting the big green lizards. I forgot to say that after my first visit to the medicine-man I asked Zorrillo to bring me iodine, peroxide, cotton-wool, bandages, quinine tablets and Stovarsol. I had once seen a convict in hospital with an ulcer as big as the medicine-man's. Chatal, the orderly, crushed a tablet of Stovarsol and put it on it. I sent the medicine-man the little wooden knife and he answered by sending me his. It was hard work to persuade him to be treated, and it took a long time. But after a few goes the ulcer was smaller by half: then he continued the treatment on his own, and one fine day he sei knife so I should come and see that it was completely healed. Nobody ever knew that it was me who had cured him.

My wives never left me. When Lali was fishing, Zoraïma was with me. If Zoraïma went off to sea, Lali stayed to keep me company.

Zato had a son. His wife went down to the beach when her pains began: she chose a big rock that sheltered her from all eyes and another of Zato's wives took her a large basket with maize-cakes, fresh water and papelon, which is unrefined brown sugar, in five-pound loaves. She must have had the child about four in the afternoon, for at sunset there she was calling out as she came towards the village, holding the baby high in the air. Before she reached him, Zato knew it was a boy. It seemed to me they said that if it had been a girl she wouldn't have raised it in the air and called out happily, but would have come quietly, just holding the baby in her arms. Lali explained it all in pantomime. Zato's wife came forward, then having held up her child she stopped. Zato held out his arms, shouting, but he did not move. Then she got up, came forward another few yards, held up the child, called out, and stopped again. Once again Zato shouted and held out his arms. This happened five or six times during the last thirty or forty yards. Still Zato never stirred from the doorway of his hut. He stood in front of the main door, with everybody to his right and left. The mother stopped no more than five or six paces off: she lifted her baby high and cried out. Now Zato stepped forward, took the child under the arms and raised it high in his turn: he shouted three times, and three times he lifted it up. Then he set the child on his right arm, laid it across his chest and put its head under his armpit, hiding it with his left arm. He walked into his hut by the main door, never turning round. Everybody followed him, the mother coming last. We drank everything there was in the way of fermented juice.

All that week they sprinkled the ground in front of Zato's hut, and the men and women pounded the earth by stamping it. In this way they formed a very large circle of thoroughly tamped red clay. The next day they put up a great tent made of bullocks' hides and I guessed there was going to be a feast. Under the shelter they arranged at least twenty huge jars full of their favourite drink. Stones were set out, and all round them piles of wood, both green and dry, that mounted every day. A good deal of this wood had been cast up long ago by the sea; it was dry, white and polished. There were some very big trunks that had been rolled up far from the waves God knows how long ago. Upon these stones they set up two forked pieces of wood, both the same height: these were the holders for an enormous spit. Four turned-over turtles; more than thirty live lizards, each as huge as the last and all with their feet and claws tied so they could not get away; two sheep: all this meat was there waiting to be knocked on the head and eaten. And at least two thousand turtle eggs.

One morning about fifteen horsemen arrived; they were all Indians wearing necklaces, very wide straw hats, loin-cloths and sleeveless sheepskin jackets with the wool turned in; their feet, legs and buttocks were naked. They all carried huge daggers in their belts, and two of them had double-barrelled guns. Their chief had a repeating rifle, a splendid jacket with black leather sleeves and a full cartridge-belt. The horses were beautiful: small, but very muscular, and all dapple grey. They carried bundles of hay on their cruppers. They announced their coming from a great way off by firing their guns, but as they came on at a full gallop they were with us very soon. The chief was wonderfully like a somewhat older version of Zato and his brother. He dismounted from his splendid horse and came towards Zato: each touched the other's shoulder. He went into the house alone and came out again holding the baby and followed by Zato. He held it out towards everybody and then he made the same motion as Zato: when he had held it out to the east, where the sun rose, he hid it under his left arm and went back into the house. Then all the other horsemen dismounted; they hobbled their horses a little way off and hung the bundle of hay from their necks. At about noon the Indian women arrived, in a huge waggon pulled by four horses. The driver was Zorrillo. In the waggon there were at least twenty young Indian girls, and seven or eight children, all of them little boys.

Before Zorrillo arrived I had been introduced to all the horsemen, starting with the chief. Zato pointed out that the little toe of his left foot was bent over the one next to it: his brother had the same thing, and so did the chief who had just come. After that he showed me that each of them had the same black mark, like a mole, under his arm. I gathered that the newcomer was his brother. Everyone greatly admired Zato's tattooing, particularly the tiger's head. All the Indian women who had just come had different-coloured patterns on their faces and bodies. Lali put coral necklaces round the necks of some of these girls, and strings of shells round others. I noticed one lovely Indian girl; she was taller than the rest, who were rather on the short side. She had the profile of an Italian — you would have said a cameo. Her hair was blue-black; her enormous eyes were a perfect jade-green and they had very long lashes and beautifully curved brows. She wore her hair in the Indian style — fringe, parting in the middle, and hair falling each side of her face and covering her ears. It was cut short a handsbreadth from the middle of her neck. Her very firm breasts started close together and spread most beautifully.

Lali introduced me and carried her off to our house with Zoraïma and another young girl who was carrying little pots and a kind of brush. For indeed the visiting Indian girls meant to paint those belonging to our village. I was there while the very pretty girl carried out a masterpiece on Lali and Zoraïma. Their brushes were made of a twig with a little piece of wool at its tip. She dipped it into various colours to make her pictures. Then I took up my brush, and starting at Lali's navel I drew a plant whose two branches went to the beginning of her breasts, and then I painted pink petals and put yellow on her nipples. It looked like a half-open flower with its pistil. The three others wanted me to do the same for them. I thought I had better ask Zorrillo. He came and told me I could paint them however I liked so long as they were willing. What did I leave undone! For more than two hours I painted all the visiting girls' bosoms and all the others' too. Zoraïma insisted upon having exactly the same picture as Lali. Meanwhile the men had been roasting the sheep on the spit, while two turtles, cut up, were cooking on the embers. The meat was a fine red — you might have taken it for beef.

I sat under the awning next to Zato and his father. The men ate on one side, and the women, apart from those who served us, on the other. Very late that night the feast ended with a sort of dance. For the dancing an Indian played a wooden flute that yielded a sharp, monotonous sound, and beat on two sheepskin drums. Many of the men and women were drunk, but nothing at all unpleasant happened. The medicine-man had come on his ass. Everyone looked at the pink scar where the ulcer had been — an ulcer known to one and all, so they were astonished to see it healed. Zorrillo and I were the only ones to know what had really happened. Zorrillo told me the chief of the visiting tribe was Zato's father and that his name was Justo, which means Just. He was the one who judged the disputes that arose between the people of his own tribe and the other tribes of the Goajira nation. He also told me that when there were difficulties with the Iapus, another Indian nation, they all met to discuss whether they should have a war or whether they should settle things in a friendly way. If an Indian was killed by the member of another tribe and they wanted to avoid war, it would be agreed that the killer should pay for the death of the man of the other tribe. Sometimes it would go as high as two hundred head of cattle, for in the mountains and the foothills all the tribes had a great many cows and steers. Unfortunately they never vaccinated against foot-and-mouth disease and the outbreaks killed great numbers. From one point of view, said Zorrillo, it was a good thing, because if it weren't for these diseases there would be too many of them. The cattle would not officially be sold in Colombia or in Venezuela; they must always stay in the Indian territory in case they should bring foot-and-mouth into the two countries. But, said Zorrillo, there was a great deal of smuggling of cattle across the mountains.

Justo, the visiting chief, told me through Zorrillo to come and see him in his village, where there were more than a hundred huts, it seemed. He told me to come with Lali and Zoraïma and he would give me a house for us, and to bring nothing, because he would provide all we could need. He said I should just bring my tattooing things to do a tiger's head on him too. He took off his black leather wrist-band and gave it to me. According to Zorrillo this meant a great deal: it was the same as saying he was my friend and that he would have no strength to refuse anything I asked. He asked me if I should like a horse; I said yes, but I couldn't have one here because there was almost no grass. He said Lali and Zoraïma could go and fetch some whenever it was necessary, half a day's ride off. He said just where and explained that the grass in that place was long and good. I accepted the horse and he said he would send it presently.

I took advantage of Zorrillo's long visit to tell him I relied upon him and that I hoped he would not betray my idea of going off to Venezuela or Colombia. He told me of the dan-what to do to show how grateful I felt for Justo's splendid generosity. Through Zorrillo he told me he knew a little about my life and that the part he didn't know must be very rich, because I was a complete man. He said this was the first time in his life he had ever known a white man: he had always considered them as enemies before, but now he was going to like them and try to find another like me. 'Think awhile,' he said, 'before going off into a land where you have many enemies; for here, in this land where we are, you have nothing but friends.'

He told me that Zato and he would watch over Lali and Zoraïma; and if he was a boy, of course Zoraïma's child would always have an honourable place in the tribe. 'I don't want to see you go. Stay, and I'll give you that beautiful girl you saw at the feast. She's a virgin, and she likes you. You could stay here with me. You'll have a big hut and as many cows and bullocks as you want.'

I left this open-handed, splendid man and went back to my village. Lali never said a word the whole journey. She was up behind me on the brown horse. The saddle must have been hurting her thighs, but she never once mentioned it. Zoraïma was behind another Indian on horseback. Zorrillo had gone off to his village by another road. It was rather cold during the night. I handed Lali a sheepskin jacket Justo had given me. She let me put it on her without saying a word or showing any emotion. Not a single movement. She let the jacket be put on her, that's all. Although the horse trotted rather hard at times, she never held me round the middle to stay on. When we reached the village and I went off to greet Zato, she took the horse and hitched it to the wall of the house with a pile of grass in front of it, without taking off its saddle and bridle. I spent a good hour with Zato and then went home.

When they are sad, Indian men and even more Indian women have impassive faces — not a muscle stirs; their eyes may be overwhelmed with sadness, but they never weep. They may groan, but they never weep. As I turned over I hurt Zoraïma's belly, and the pain made her cry out. So I got up in case it should happen again and went and lay in another hammock. It was a very low-slung hammock, and as I was lying there I felt someone touch it. I pretended to be asleep. Lali was sitting motionless on a stump of wood looking at me. A moment later I knew that Zoraïma was there: she had a way of rubbing orange-flowers on her skin by way of scent. She got them in little bags, trading with an Indian woman who came to the village now and then. When I woke up they were still there, immobile. The sun was up, and it was almost eight o'clock. I led them down to the beach and I lay there on the dry sand. Lali sat down and so did Zoraïma. I stroked Zoraïma's breasts and belly: she remained quite unmoved. I lay Lali down and kissed her: she closed her mouth. The fisherman came to wait for Lali. At the first sight of her face he understood what was going on and went away. I was really grieved, and the only thing I could think of doing was to stroke and kiss them to show I loved them. Not a single word did they utter. I was deeply upset at the sight of so much pain caused by the mere idea of what their life would be when I was gone. Lali tried to force herself to make love, giving herself to me with a kind of mad despair. What was her motive? There could only be one - to get herself with child by me.

This morning for the first time I saw her jealous of Zoraïma. We were lying in a sheltered hollow in the fine sand on the beach, and I was stroking Zoraïma's bosom and belly while she was nibbling the lobes of my ear when Lali appeared, took her sister by the arm, ran her hand over her rounded belly and then over her own, flat and smooth. Zoraïma got up and, as though she were saying 'Yes, you're right', she let Lali have her place at my side.

The women gave me my food every day, but they ate nothing themselves. It was three days now since they had eaten anything at all. I took the horse and I very nearly committed a serious error, the first in more than five months - I went to see the medicine-man without asking permission. On the way I realized what I was doing, and instead of going to his tent I rode to and fro two hundred yards from it. He saw me and beckoned to me. As well as I could I made him understand that Lali and Zoraïma were no longer eating anything. He gave me a kind of nut that I was to put in the drinking-water at home. I went back and put the nut in the big jar. They drank several times, but even so they did not start eating. Lali no longer went fishing. Today, after four days of complete fasting, she did something very rash: she went nearly two hundred yards from the shore - swimming, not in a canoe - and came back with thirty oysters for me to eat. Their dumb misery upset me so much I could scarcely eat anything either.

It had been going on for six days now. Lali was in bed feverish. In six days she had sucked a few lemons, nothing else. Zoraïma ate once a day, at noon. I no longer knew what to do. I sat there next to Lali. She was lying on the ground on a hammock that I had folded to make a sort of mattress for her: she stared steadily at the ceiling of the hut and never moved. I looked at her; I looked at Zoraïma with her peaked belly; and I don't know why, but I began to weep. For myself maybe? Maybe for them? God knows. I wept, and the heavy tears rolled down my cheeks. Zoraïma saw them and began to moan; at this Lali turned her head and saw me crying. With one spring she got up and sat between my legs, groaning gently. She kissed me and stroked me. Zoraïma put an arm round my shoulders and Lali began talking – talking on and on and moaning at the same time – and Zoraïma answered her. She seemed to be blaming Lali. Lali took a piece of sugar the size of a fist, showed me she was melting it in water, and drank it off in two gulps. Then she went out with Zoraïma. I heard them pulling out the horse and when I came outside I found it ready saddled and bitted, with the reins round the pommel of the saddle. I took the sheepskin jacket for Zoraïma and Lali put a folded hammock for her to sit on in front. Zoraïma mounted first, almost on the horse's neck, then me in the middle and Lali behind. I was so upset I set off without saying anything to anyone or telling the chief.

I had supposed we were going to see the medicine-man and I set off in that direction; but no, Lali pulled the reins and said 'Zorrillo'. It was Zorrillo we were going to see. As we went, she held me tight by the belt and often she kissed the back of my neck. I had the reins in my left hand, and with my right I stroked Zoraïma. We reached Zorrillo's village just as he was coming back from Colombia with three asses and a horse, all very heavily laden. We went into the house. Lali spoke first, then Zoraïma.

And this is what Zorrillo told me: until the moment I wept, Lali had thought I was a white man who considered her as of no importance whatsoever. Lali knew very well I was going to go; but I was as false as a serpent because never had I told her or tried to make her understand. She said she was very, very deeply disappointed, because she had imagined an Indian girl like her could make a man happy – and a contented man did not go away. She thought there was no point in her going on living after such a disaster. Zoraïma said the same thing, and as well as all that she had been afraid her son would turn out like his father – a false man with no word that could be relied upon, one who asked his wives, who would give their lives for him, things so hard they could not possibly understand him. Why was I running away from her as though she were the dog that had bitten me the day I arrived?

I answered, 'Lali, what would you do if your father was ill?'

'I'd walk over thorns to go and look after him.'

'What would you do, once you could stand up for yourself, to someone who had hunted you like an animal, trying to kill you?'

'I'd look for my enemy everywhere, so as to bury him so far down he'd never even be able to turn in his hole.'

'And when you had done all these things, what would you do if you had two marvellous wives waiting for you?'

'I'd ride back on a horse.'

'That's what I shall do, and that's dead certain.'

'And what if I'm old and ugly when you come back?'

'I'll be back long before you're old and ugly.'

'Yes: you let water run from your eyes. You could never have done that on purpose. So you may leave when you want; but you must go in broad daylight, in front of everybody, not like a thief. You must go just as you came, at the same time in the afternoon, properly dressed like a white man. You must say who is to watch over us night and day. Zato is the chief, but there must be another man to look after us. You must say that the house is still your house and that not a single man except for your son – if it is a man Zoraïma has in her womb – not a single man must ever come into it. Zorrillo must come the day you go. So that he can repeat all you have to say.'

We slept at Zorrillo's. It was a wonderfully soft warm night. The murmuring and whispering of those two daughters of nature had such moving, loving tones that I was deeply stirred. We rode back all three, going slowly because of Zoraïma. I was to leave a week after the new moon, for Lali wanted to let me know whether it was certain she was pregnant. She had seen no blood the moon before. She was afraid she might be mistaken, but if she still saw none this month it would mean she was with child. Zorrillo was to bring all the things I was to wear: I was to dress there in the village when I had ridden like a Goajira, that is to say, naked. The day before we rode all three to go and see the medicine-man. There was nothing sad about this slow return. They preferred knowing to staying there, abandoned and mocked by the men and women of the village. When Zoraïma had had her child, she would take a fisherman to go out and bring up a great many pearls, which she would keep for me. Lali too would fish longer every day, so as to keep occupied. I was sorry I had not learnt to speak more than a dozen words of Goajira. There were so many things I wanted to tell them that could not be said through an interpreter. We reached the village. The first thing to be done was to see Zato and tell him I was sorry I had gone off without saying anything to him. Zato was as noble-minded as his father. Before I could speak he put his hand upon my throat and said, 'Uilu (be quiet).' The new moon would be in about twelve days. Together with the eight I was to wait afterwards, that would make twenty before I left.

While I was looking at the map again, altering various details about getting round the villages, I thought over what Justo had said to me. Where could I be happier than here, where everybody loved me? Wasn't I bringing misfortune on myself, going back to civilization? The future would show.

These three weeks flashed by. Lali knew for sure she was pregnant, and it would be two or three children that would be waiting for me to return. Why three? She told me her mother had twice had twins. We went to see the medicine-man. No, my door was not to be shut up. There was to be nothing more than a branch set across it. The hammock in which we all three lay was to be slung from the roof of the hut. They must always go to bed in it together, because now they were only one being. Then he made us sit close to the fire, put on some green leaves and surrounded us with smoke for more than ten minutes. We went home and waited for Zorrillo, who arrived that same evening. We spent the whole of that night talking round a fire in front of my hut. By means of Zorrillo I said something friendly to each man of the village and they all answered with something of the same kind. At sunrise I went in with Lali and Zoraïma. We made love all day long. Zoraïma got on top of me to feel me in her better and Lali wrapped herself round me like a creeper, holding me tight inside her pulsating body - it beat like a heart. The afternoon brought the time for my going. With Zorrillo translating I said, 'Zato, great chief of this tribe that took me in and that gave me every-come back, that's dead certain. When? How? I can't tell, but I promise to come back.

Towards the end of the afternoon Zorrillo mounted and we set off for Colombia. I had on a straw hat! I walked along, holding my horse by the bridle. All the Indians in the tribe, every single one, hid his face with his left arm and stretched the right out towards me. This meant they didn't want to see me go because it hurt them too much; and holding out their arms with the hand in the air was a gesture to hold me back. Lali and Zoraïma went with me for a hundred yards. I thought they were going to kiss me when suddenly they turned; and shrieking they ran to our house, never looking back.

Santa Marta Prison

There was no difficulty in leaving the Indian territory of Goajira, and we crossed the La Vela frontier posts without any trouble. On horseback we could make the journey which had taken me so long with Antonio in no more than two days. But it was not only these frontier posts that were extremely dangerous; there was also a seventy-five mile zone as far as Rio Hacha, the village I had escaped from.

In a kind of inn where you could eat and drink I carried out my first experiment in conversation with a Colombian civilian, Zorrillo at my side. I brought it off fairly well; and as Zorrillo had said, a strong stammer did a great deal to disguise accent and manner of speaking.

We set off again in the direction of Santa Marta. Zorrillo was to leave me when we got half way and go back that morning.

Zorrillo left me. We decided he should take the horse back with him. For after all, owning a horse meant having an address, belonging to some given village or other and so running the risk of being forced to answer awkward questions. 'You know So-and-So? What's the name of the mayor? What does Madame X do? Who keeps the fonda?'

No: it was better I should carry on on foot, travelling by lorry or bus, and then after Santa Marta by train. I was to be a forastero (stranger) in those parts saying I had just any sort of a job and place of work. Zorrillo changed three of the hundred-peso gold pieces for me. He gave me a thousand pesos. A good workman made eight or ten a day, so just with that alone I had plenty to keep myself for quite a time. I got aboard a lorry that was going very close to Santa Marta, quite a considerable port about seventy-five miles from the place where Zorrillo left me. The lorry was going to fetch goats or kids - I couldn't quite make out what.

Every six or seven miles there was a tavern. The driver got out and asked me to have a drink. He asked me, but I was the one who paid. And every time he drank five or six glasses of fiery spirits. I pretended to drink just one. By the time we had gone thirty miles he was as drunk as Davy's sow. He was so pissed he took the wrong direction and got into a muddy side road where the lorry bogged down and could not get out. The Colombian didn't worry. He lay down in the back and told me to sleep in the cab. I didn't know what I ought to do. It must still be twenty-five miles to Santa Marta. Being with him meant that I was not questioned by people we met, and in spite of all these stops, I still got along quicker than on foot.

So towards the morning I made up my mind to go to sleep. Day was breaking; so it must have been about seven o'clock. And here was a cart pulled by two horses. The lorry prevented it from getting by. Since I was sleeping in the cab they thought I was the driver; and they woke me up. I stammered and put on the look of a man started out of his sleep not rightly knowing which way up he is.

The real driver woke and argued with the man of the cart. After several tries we still could not manage to get the lorry out of the mud. It was in it up to its axles: nothing to be done. There were two black-dressed nuns in the cart, with coifs, and they had three little girls with them. After a great deal of talk the two men agreed to cut a clear space in the bush so the cart could get round, one wheel on the road and the other on the cleared part, thus avoiding the twenty yards of mud.

Each had a machète – a knife for cutting sugar-cane: a tool carried by every man travelling the roads – and they cut everything that stood in the way while I laid it on the road to make it less deep and also to prevent the cart sinking in. In two hours or so the path was ready. It was then that one of the nuns, having thanked me, asked me where I was going. I said, 'Santa Marta.'

'But you're not going in the right direction. You must turn back with us. We'll take you very close to Santa Marta – only five miles from it.'

It was impossible for me to refuse: it would have made me look conspicuous. I should have liked to be able to say I was staying with the driver to give him a hand, but faced with the difficulty of bringing all that out, I preferred saying, 'Gracias, Gracias.'

And there I was in the back of the cart with the three little girls: the two nuns sat on the seat next to the driver.

We set off and quite quickly covered the three or four miles the lorry had taken by mistake. Once we reached the good road we trotted along, and about noon we stopped at an inn to eat. The three little girls and the carter were at one table and the nuns and I ate at another. The nuns were young, between twenty-five and thirty. Very white skinned. One was Spanish, the other Irish. Gently the Irish one questioned me. 'You're not from here, are you?'

'Oh yes, I come from Baranquilla.'

'No, you're not a Colombian: your hair is too fair and your skin is only dark because it's sunburnt. Where do you come from?'

'Rio Hacha.'

'What did you do there?'

'Electrician.'

'Oh? I've a friend in the electricity company. His name's Perez: he's a Spaniard. Do you know him?'

'Yes.'

'I'm glad.'

At the end of the meal they got up to go and wash their hands and the Irish nun came back alone. She looked at me and then in French she said, 'I shan't betray you but my companion says she's seen your picture in the paper. You're the Frenchman who escaped from the Rio Hacha prison, aren't you?'

Denying it would have been even worse. 'Yes, Sister. I beg you not to give me away. I'm not the wicked type they said. I love God and respect Him.'

The Spanish nun appeared: speaking to her the Irishwoman said, 'Yes.' There was a very quick reply that I didn't understand. They looked as if they were thinking; then they got up and went to the lavatory again. I thought fast during the five minutes of their absence. Should I get out before they came back? Should I stay? It would come to the same thing if they betrayed me, because if I left I'd soon be found. These parts had no really thick bush, and it would take no time to put a watch on the roads leading to the towns. I decided to trust to fate, which so far had not been unkind to me.

They came back smiling all over their faces and the Irish one asked me my name.

'Enrique.'

'Very well, Enrique: you must come with us as far as the convent we're going to, which is five miles from Santa Marta. You needn't be afraid of anything, travelling with us in the cart. Don't speak, and everybody will think you're a workman belonging to the convent.'

The sisters paid for everybody. I bought a tinder-lighter and twelve packets of cigarettes. We set off. All the time we travelled the nuns never spoke to me, which I was grateful for. This way the driver never realized I spoke badly. Towards the end of the afternoon we pulled up at a large inn. A bus was standing there and on it I read Río Hacha - Santa Marta. I felt like taking it. I went up to the Irish nun and told her I was going to make use of this bus.

'That would be very dangerous,' said she, 'because before we get to Santa Marta there are at least two police posts where they ask passengers for their cédula (identity card); and that wouldn't happen in the cart.'

I thanked her heartily, and now the anxiety I'd felt ever since they discovered me vanished entirely. On the contrary, it was a stroke of wonderful luck for me, meeting these nuns. Just as they said, at nightfall we reached a police post (alcabala in Spanish). A bus, coming from Santa Marta and going to Río Hacha, was being inspected by the police. I was lying on my back in the cart with my straw hat over my face, pretending to be asleep. A little girl of about eight had her head on my shoulder, and she really was asleep. When the cart went through the driver stopped his horses just between the bus and the post.

'Cómo estan por aquí? (how are you all here?)' asked the Spanish nun.

'Muy bien, Hermana (Very well, Sister).'

'Me alegro, vamos, muchachos (I'm glad to hear it; let's go on, children).' And we drove quietly on.

At ten at night, another post, very brightly lit. Two lines of cars of all kinds waiting. One line coming from the right and ours from the left. The boots of the cars were opened and the police looked inside. I saw one woman made to get out; she was scrabbling in her handbag. She was taken off to the police post. She probably had no cédula. In that case there was nothing to be done. The cars went by one at a time. As there were two lines there was no possibility of being let through as a avour: there was no space, and so we had to resign ourselves to waiting. As far as I could see I was lost. In front of us there was a little bus crammed with people; on top, luggage and cases, and behind a kind of big net full of all sorts of bundles. Four police made all the passengers get out. The bus had only one door, in front. The men and women all filed through it. Some women carrying babies. And one by one they all got in again. 'Cédula! Cédula!' And they all brought out a card with a photograph on and showed it.

Zorrillo had never told me about this. If I'd known, maybe I could have tried to get myself a forged one. I said to myself that if only I could get past this post I'd pay any money at all and somehow get hold of a cédula before travelling from Santa Marta to Baranquilla, a very large town on the Atlantic coast – two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, said my book.

Christ, this bus business was taking a long time. The Irish nun turned round. 'Rest easy, now, Enrique,' she said. Straight away I was furious with her for this incautious word – the driver must surely have heard.

Our turn came and the cart moved forward into the brilliant light. I had decided to sit up. It seemed to me it might look as though I were trying to hide, lying down like that. I leant my back against the slatted tail-board of the cart, facing towards the nuns' backs. I could only be seen from the side and my hat was pretty low down, but not exaggeratedly so.

'Cómo estan todos por aquí? (How is everybody here?)" said the Spanish nun again.

'Muy bien, Hermanas. Y cómo viajan tan tarde? (Very well, Sisters. Why are you travelling so late?)'

'Por una urgencia, por eso no me detengo. Somos muy apuradas. (Because of an emergency, so do not keep us. We are in a great hurry.)'

'Vayanse con Dios, Hermanas (Go with God, Sisters).'

'Gracias, hijos. Que Dios les proteja. (Thank you, my sons. May God protect you.)'

'Amén (Amen),' said the police. And we passed quietly on, without anyone asking us anything. A hundred yards farther on the nuns made the cart stop and disappeared into the bush for a while. I was so moved that when the Irish nun got in again I said to her, 'Thank you, Sister.'

She said, 'It was nothing: but we were so frightened it upset our stomachs.'

About midnight we reached the convent. A high wall, a great door. The driver went off to stable the horses and cart and the three little girls were led into the convent. On the steps of the courtyard a heated discussion began between the two nuns and the sister in charge of the gate. The Irishwoman told me that she wouldn't wake the Mother Superior to ask her permission for me to sleep in the convent. At this point I was stupid - I didn't make my mind up quickly enough. I ought to have made the most of this incident to get out and leave for Santa Marta - I knew there was only five miles to go.

It was a mistake that cost me seven years of penal servitude.

At last the Mother Superior was woken and they gave me a room on the second floor. I could see the lights of the town from the window: I could make out the lighthouse and the markers in the channel. A big vessel was moving out of the harbour.

I went to sleep, and the sun was up when they knocked on my door. I had had a hideous dream. Lali ripped her belly open in front of me and our child came out in little pieces.

I shaved and washed very quickly. I went downstairs. At the bottom the Irish nun greeted me with a faint smile. 'Good morning, Henri. Did you sleep well?'

'Yes, Sister.'

'Please come along to the Mother Superior's office: she wants to see you.'

We walked in. There was a woman sitting behind a desk. A woman of about fifty or even more with a very severe face: her black eyes looked at me without the least tenderness. 'Señor, sabe usted hablar español? (Do you speak Spanish?)'

'Muy poco (Very little).'

'Bueno, la Hermana va servir de intérprete (Very well, the Sister will interpret for us). They tell me you are French?'

'Yes, Mother.'

'Did you escape from prison at Rio Hacha?'

'Yes, Mother.'

'How long ago?'

'About seven months.'

'What have you been doing meanwhile?'

'I was with the Indians.'

'What? You with the Indians? I can't accept that. Those savages have never allowed anyone into their territory. Not even one single missionary has been able to get in – just imagine that. I cannot have that answer. Where were you? Tell me the truth.'

'I was with the Indians, Mother, and I can prove it.'

'How?'

'With these pearls they fished up.' My bag was pinned to the back of my jacket: I undid it and passed it over. She opened it and a handful of pearls spilled out.

'How many pearls are there here?'

'I don't know: maybe five or six hundred. About that.'

'This is no proof. You might have stolen them somewhere else.'

'To set your mind at rest, Mother, I'll stay here until you can find out whether there have been any pearls stolen, if you like. I've got some money. I can pay for my keep. I promise I won't stir from my room until you say.'

She looked at me very hard. At the same moment it occurred to me she would be saying to herself, 'And what if you escape? You've already escaped from prison; you'd find it easier from here.'

'I'll leave you my bag of pearls – my whole fortune. I know they're in good hands.'

'Very well, then. But you don't have to stay shut up in your room. You may come down into the garden in the morning and afternoon when my daughters are in chapel. You can eat in the kitchen with the staff.'

I came away from this interview more or less at ease. I was about to go up to my room again, but the Irish nun led me to the kitchen. A big bowl of café au lait, very new black bread, and butter. The nun watched me breakfast, standing there in front of me. She looked anxious. I said, 'Thank you, Sister, for all you have done for me.'

'I'd like to do more, but I can't – nothing more at all, friend Henri,' and with this she left the kitchen.

I sat at the window and I gazed at the town and the port and the sea. The countryside all round was well cultivated. I could not get rid of the notion that I was in danger. So much so that I made up my mind to escape the coming night. Never mind about the pearls: let the Mother Superior keep them for her convent or for herself if she liked! I didn't trust her, and it wasn't likely I was wrong, for how come she, a Catalan, the Mother Superior of a convent and therefore an educated woman, didn't speak French? It wasn't believable. Conclusion: I'd be off that night. Yes, in the afternoon I'd go down into the courtyard and find out where I could get over the wall. At about one o'clock there was a knock on my door. 'Please come down for your meal, Henri.'

'Yes, I'm coming. Thank you.'

I was sitting at the kitchen table and I had hardly begun to help myself to a dish of meat and boiled potatoes when the door opened and in came four white-uniformed police with rifles and an officer with a revolver.

'No te mueve, o te mato (Don't move or I kill you).' He handcuffed me. The Irish nun uttered a great shriek and fainted. Two kitchen-sisters picked her up.

'Vamos (Let's go),' said the chief. He took me up to my room. They searched my bundle and straight away they found the thirty-six hundred-peso gold coins I still had, but they put the case with poisoned arrows aside without looking at it — no doubt they thought it was pencils. With a satisfaction he didn't attempt to hide the chief put the gold coins into his pocket. We left. An old creak of a car in the courtyard.

The five police and I crammed ourselves into this contraption and set off at full speed, driven by a chauffeur in police uniform, as black as coal. I was completely overwhelmed and I made no sort of a protest. I was doing all I could to hold myself together: this was no time to be asking for pity or forgiveness — be a man and remember you must never give up hope. All this flashed through my mind. And when I got out of the car I was so determined to look like a man and not like a mouse, and I succeeded so well that the first thing the officer who interrogated me said was, 'This Frenchman is tough all right: he doesn't seem to give a damn about being caught.' I walked into his office. I took off my hat and I sat down without being asked, my bundle between my feet.

'Tu sabes hablar español? (Can you speak Spanish, man?)'

'No.'

'Llame el zapatero (Call the cobbler).' A few minutes later there appeared a little man in a blue apron, carrying a shoemaker's hammer in his hand.

'Are you the Frenchman who escaped from Rio Hacha a year ago?'

'No.'

'You're lying.'

'I'm not lying. I am not the Frenchman who escaped from Rio Hacha a year ago.'

'Undo his handcuffs. Take off your jacket and shirt, man.' (He took up a paper and looked at it. All the tattooings were described.) 'You lack the thumb of your left hand. Yes. So it's you, then.'

'No it's not me, because it's not a year ago that I left. I left seven months back.'

'It's all one.'

'Maybe it is for you, man. Not for me.'

'I get it: you're the typical killer. French or Colombian, you killers (matadores) are all the same – untameable. I'm only the deputy-governor of this prison. I don't know what they'll do with you. For the moment I'll put you in with your companions.'

'What companions?'

'The Frenchmen you brought to Colombia.'

I followed the police, who took me to a cell whose barred windows looked out on to the courtyard. Here were all five of my friends again. We embraced. 'We thought you were out and away for good, mate,' said Clousiot. Maturette wept like the child he was. And the three others were thunderstruck too. The sight of them all gave me back my strength.

'Tell us all about it,' they said.

'Later. What about you?'

'We've been here these three months past.'

'Do they treat you good?'

'Neither good nor bad. We're waiting to be transferred to Baranquilla, where they're going to hand us over to the French authorities, it seems.'

'What a set of swine! And what about making a break?'

'You've hardly got here before you're thinking of getting out!'

'What's so bleeding odd about that? Do you think I'm giving in just like that? Are you very strictly watched?'

'Not all that much by day, but at night there's a special guard for us.'

'How many?'

'Three warders.'

'How's your leg?'

'OK. I don't even limp.'

'Are you always shut in?'

'No, we can take the sun in the yard, two hours in the morning and three in the afternoon.'

'What are the other Colombian prisoners like?'

'It seems there are some very dangerous types, the thieves as bad as the killers.'

I was in the yard that afternoon, talking to Clousiot privately, when I was sent for. I followed the cop into the same office as that morning. There I found the governor of the prison together with the one who'd already questioned me. It was a very dark man who was sitting in the place of honour - he was almost black. From his colour you would have said more black than Indian, and his short curly hair was that of a Negro. He was about fifty: black, wicked eyes. A very short-clipped moustache over the thick lips of a violent, angry mouth. His collar was open - no tie. On the left-hand side the green and white ribbon of some decoration or other. The cobbler was there too.

'Frenchman, you have been retaken after an escape of seven months. What did you do during that time?'

'I was with the Goajiras.'

'Don't you presume to make game of me or I'll have you punished.'

'It's true.'

'No one's ever lived with the Indians. This year alone they've killed more than twenty-five coastguards.'

'No, the coastguards were killed by smugglers.'

'How do you know?'

'I lived there seven months. The Goajiras never leave their own country.'

'All right, maybe it's true. Where did you steal these thirty-six hundred-peso pieces?'

'They're mine. It was the chief of a mountain tribe called Justo who gave them to me.'

'How could an Indian possess a fortune like this and then give it to you?'

'Well, Chief, has there been any robbery with gold hundred-peso pieces in it?'

'No: that's true. There's been no such theft in the reports. But that doesn't mean we shan't make inquiries.'

'Do. It's to my advantage.'

'Frenchman, you committed a serious crime by escaping from the Rio Hacha gaol, and a still more serious one in helping such a man as Antonio to escape - he was going to be shot for having killed several coastguards. Now we know that you are wanted by the French and that you've got a life sentence waiting for you. You're a dangerous killer. So I'm not going to leave you with the other Frenchmen and run the risk of having you escape again. You're going to be put into the black-hole until you leave for Baranquilla. The gold coins will be given back if it is found there's been no such robbery.'

I left the office and they took me to a staircase that led underground. After we had gone down more than twenty-five steps we reached a very dimly-lit corridor with cages to the right and the left. One of the cells was opened and I was shoved in. When the door on to the passage closed a smell of decay rose from the slimy earth floor. I was hailed from all sides. Each barred hole had one, two or three prisoners.

'Francés, Francés! Que has hecho? Por que esta aqui?'
(What did you do? What are you in for?) Do you know these are the death cells?'

'You shut up! Let him speak,' shouted a voice.

'Yes, I'm French. I'm here because I escaped from the prison at Rio Hacha.' They understood my pidgin-Spanish perfectly well.

'Listen to this, Frenchman: I'll tell you something. There's a plank at the back of your cell. That's to lie down on. On the right you'll find a tin with water in it. Don't waste any, because they only give you a very little in the morning and you can't ask for any more. On the left there's a latrine bucket. Cover it over with your jacket. You won't need a coat because it's so hot, so cover your bucket so it won't smell so bad. We all cover our buckets with our clothes, we do.'

I went to the bars and tried to make out their faces. I could only see the two opposite, right up against the bars with their legs out into the corridor. One was the Spanish-Indian type, like those first police who arrested me at Rio Hacha: the other was a very light-coloured Negro, a handsome young fellow. The Negro warned me that the water rose in the cells at each high tide. I was not to be frightened, because the water never came up higher than your middle. I was not to catch hold of the rats that might climb on to me; I was to hit them.

Never catch hold of them if you don't want to be bitten. I said, 'How long have you been in this black-hole?'

'Two months.'

'What about the others?'

'Never more than three months. If they don't take you out after three months, that means you're meant to die down here.'

'The one who's been here longest – how long has he had?'

'Eight months, but he won't last much longer now. This last month he's only been able to get up on to his knees. He can't stand. A really high tide and he'll drown.'

'They're savages, then, in this country of yours?'

'I never said we were civilized, did I? Yours is no more civilized either, since you've got a life sentence. Here in Colombia it's either twenty years or death. But never life.'

'Well, there you are, then. It's much the same everywhere.'

'Did you kill many people?'

'No. Only one.'

'That's not possible. For just one man you never get a sentence like that.'

'I give you my word it's true.'

'Well, then, your country's as savage as mine, don't you see?'

'OK, we won't argue about our countries. You're right. The police are shits everywhere. And what did you do?'

'I killed a man, his son and his wife.'

'Why?'

'They'd given my little brother to a sow to eat.'

'Christ above! It's not possible!'

'My little brother – he was five – used to throw stones at their boy every day, and he'd hit him on the head a good many times.'

'Still, that's no reason.'

'That's what I said when I found out.'

'How did you find out?'

'My little brother had been gone, missing for three and when I was searching for him I found one of his in the dunghill. This dung came from the sow's sty, through the muck and I found a bloodstained white cloth. I knew what that meant. The woman confessed before them. I made them say their prayers before I shot the first shot I broke the father's legs.'

'You were quite right to kill them. What are you going to get?'

'Twenty years at the outside.'

'Why are you in the black-hole?'

'I hit a policeman belonging to their family. He was here in this prison. They've taken him away. He's not here any more, so I'm easy in my mind.'

The passage door opened. A warder came in with two prisoners who were carrying a wooden tub on two wooden poles. Behind them, right at the back, you could just see the shape of two more warders with rifles. They went along cell by cell, emptying the buckets into the tub. The stench of excrement and urine filled the air until you choked. No one spoke. When they reached me the one who took my bucket dropped a little packet on the ground. Quickly I shoved it farther into the darkness with my foot. When they had gone I found two packets of cigarettes in the parcel, a tinder-lighter and a note in French. First I lit two cigarettes and tossed them to the guys opposite. Then I called my neighbour, who held out his hand and caught cigarettes and passed them on to the others. When I'd handed them out I lit my own and tried to read the note by the corridor light. But I couldn't manage. So then I made a roll of the wrapping paper, and after a good many tries I got it to light. Quickly I read, 'Keep your heart up, Papillon. Rely on us. Look out for yourself. Tomorrow we'll send you paper and pencil so you can write. We're with you to the death.' How that note comforted me and warmed my heart! I was not alone any more, since my friends were there and I could count on them.

No one spoke. Everybody was smoking. Handing out these cigarettes showed me there were nineteen of us in these death cells. Well, here I was on the way down the drain again; and this time I was up to the neck in it. These Little Sisters of the Lord were rather sisters to the Devil. And yet it couldn't possibly have been the Irishwoman or the Spanish nun who betrayed me. Oh what a God-damned fool I had been to believe in those nuns! No, not them. Maybe the carter? Two or three times we had been careless, talking French. Might he have heard? What did it matter? You've copped it this time cock; and you've copped it good and proper. Nuns, driver, Mother Superior - it all comes to the same thing in the end.

Fucked is what I am, down here in this stinking cell that floods twice a day, it seems. The heat was so stifling I first took off my shirt and then my trousers. And my shoes, and I hung everything on the bars.

And to think I had gone fifteen hundred miles just to end up here! What a very brilliant success. Dear God. Are You going to abandon me now, You who have been so open-handed with me? Maybe You're angry: for after all You did give me freedom – the most certain, the most beautiful kind of freedom. You had given me a community that took me to its heart. You gave me not just one but two splendid wives. And You gave me the sun, and the sea. A hut where I was the unquestioned master. That primitive, natural life – very simple, but Lord how sweet and gentle. What an unrivalled gift You gave me – freedom, with no police, no judges, no back-biters or evil men around me! And I didn't know how to value it at its true worth. The sea so blue that it was almost green or black; those sunrises and sunsets that made everything swim in such gentle, peaceful serenity; that way of living without money, where I lacked nothing a man really wants – I had despised it all: I had trampled it underfoot. And all for what? For a society that wanted nothing to do with me. For people who would not even trouble to find out whether there was some good in me. For a world that rejected me – that would not even give me the smallest hope. For a community that only thought of one thing: wiping me out at any price.

When they heard of my recapture, how they'd laugh, those twelve bastards on the jury, that lousy Poléin, the cops and the prosecuting counsel. For there'd certainly be some journalist who'd send the news to France.

And what about my family? They must have been so happy when the gendarmes came to tell them their son or brother had escaped from his gaolers! Now they would have to suffer all over again at the news that I was retaken.

I'd been wrong to abandon my tribe. Yes, I could certainly say 'my tribe', because they had all adopted me. I have done wrong and I deserve what is happening to me. But still . . . I'd not escaped just so as to increase the Indian population of South America. Dear Lord, You must understand that I just have to live in an ordinary civilized society once more and prove that I can be a harmless member of it. That's my real destiny – with Your help or without it.

I must manage to prove that I can be ~ that I am and shall be ~ an ordinary human being, if indeed not a better one than the other members of some given community or some given country.

I was smoking. The water began to rise. It was almost up to my ankles. I called, 'Black, how long does the water stay in the cell?'

'That depends on the strength of the tide. One hour: -two at the most.'

I heard several prisoners saying, 'Esta llegando (Here it comes)!'

Very, very gradually the water rose. The half-caste and the Negro had climbed up on their bars: their legs were hanging out into the passage and their arms were round the uprights. I heard a noise in the water: it was a sewer-rat as big as a cat splashing about. It tried to get up the bars. I took hold of one of my shoes and when it came towards me I fetched it a great swipe on the head. It ran off down the corridor, squealing.

The Negro said to me, 'You've started hunting already, Francés. You've got a lot on your plate if you want to kill them all. Climb on to the bars, drape yourself round them and take it easy.'

I took his advice, but the bars cut into my thighs: I couldn't stand the position for long. I uncovered my bucket-latrine, tied my jacket to the irons and then sat on it. It formed a kind of seat that made the position more bearable, because now I was almost sitting down.

This coming in of the water, the rats, the centipedes and the tiny waterborne crabs, was the most revolting, the most depressing thing a human being could possibly have to bear. A good hour later, when the water ebbed away, it left half an inch of slimy mud. I put on my shoes, so as not to have to paddle in this filth. The black chucked me a four-inch piece of wood, telling me to sweep the mud out into the passage, starting first by the plank I was to sleep on and then at the back of the cell. This took me quite half an hour, and it forced me to think of what I was doing and nothing else. That was already something. There'd be no more water until the next tide, that is to say I'd have just eleven hours, since it was only during the last hour that it came in. Before we had it again I should have to reckon the six hours of the ebb and the five of the flood. A thought came to me – a rather absurd idea. 'Papillon, it's your fate to be linked to the tides. The moon is very important for you and your life, whether you like it or not. It was the flood and the ebb tides that let you get down the Maroni so easily when you escaped from penal. It was by working out the time of the tide that you left Trinidad and Curaçao. And the reason why you were arrested at Rio Hacha was that the tide wasn't strong enough to sweep you out quick enough: and now here you are, at the mercy of this tide for good and all.'

If one day these pages are printed, maybe some of their readers will feel a little pity for me when they learn what I had to bear in the Colombian black-hole. Those people are the good ones. The others, first cousins to the twelve bastards who found me guilty, or the prosecuting counsel's brothers, will say, 'It serves him right: he only had to stay in penal and it'd never have happened.' Well, whether you're one of the good guys or whether you're one of the bastards, would you like me to tell you something? I was not in despair, not at all: indeed I'll go farther and say I'd rather have been in the cells of that old Colombian fortress, built by the Spanish Inquisition, than in the Iles du Salut, where I ought to have been. Here there was a good deal still that I could try for carrying on with my break; and even in this rotting hole I was still at least fifteen hundred miles from the penal settlement. They were really going to have to take remarkable precautions to make me go all those fifteen hundred miles in reverse. There was only one thing I regretted – my Goajira tribe, Lali and Zoraima, and that freedom in a life of nature. Without the comfort a civilized man looks for to be sure, but without police or prisons either, still less black-holes. I reflected that it would never occur to my savages to inflict a punishment of this kind on an enemy, far less to someone like me, who had never done the Colombians the slightest harm.

I lay down on the plank and I smoked two or three cigarettes at the back of my cell so the others shouldn't see. When I gave the black back his piece of wood I also tossed him a lighted cigarette and he, feeling awkward because of the others, did the same. These details may seem to have no sort of importance at all, but as I see it they meant a great deal. It proved that we, the outcasts of society, did at least possess the remains of a sense of right behaviour and consideration for others.

This place wasn't like the Conciergerie. Here I could dream and let my mind wander without having to put a handkerchief over my eyes to protect them from the glare.

Who could it have been who told the police I was in the convent? Oh, if I were to find out one day, it'd cost him a packet. And then I said to myself, 'Don't talk balls, Papillon. What with all you've got to do in France by way of revenge, you've not come to this country in the back of beyond to do harm to anyone! Life itself will certainly punish the informer, and if one day you do come back it won't be for revenge but to bring happiness to Lali and Zoraïma and perhaps the children they'll have had by you. If you do come back to this God-forsaken place it'll be for them and for all the Goajiras who did you the honour of accepting you as one of themselves. I'm still on the way down the drain, but even right down in an underwater black-hole I'm still on the run, whether they like it or not - on the way to freedom. That's something that can't possibly be denied.'

I was brought paper, a pencil, two packets of cigarettes. Three days I had been here now. Or rather three nights, because down here it was night all the time. As I lit a first-class cigarette I couldn't but admire the solidarity between the prisoners. The Colombian who gave me the packet was running a hell of a risk. If he was caught it would be a spell in those same punishment cells for him that was for sure. He certainly knew it, and agreeing to help me in my escapade was not only brave but it showed rare nobility of mind. Lightning the paper as I had done before I read Papillon, we know you're bearing up well. Bravo! Send to my wife. Think the same with us. A nun who spoke French came to see you. They didn't let her talk to us, but a Colombian says he had time to talk to the Frenchman who is in the death cell. She said you came back. That's all. Love from your friend.

It was not easy to answer the cell messenger in code. Thanks for everything. In talking to the French consul - you have known him for some time - I shall handle the message so in case of trouble they are protected. Don't touch the point of the pen. Long life to you.

Break at Santa Marta

It was not until twenty-eight days later that I was brought out of that loathsome hole, and then it was because of the intervention of the Belgian consul at Santa Marta, a man named Klausen. The black, whose name was Palacios and who got out three weeks after I first came, had the idea of telling his mother, when she came to see him, that she was to warn the Belgian consul that there was a Belgian in the black-hole. The notion came to him one Sunday when he had seen a Belgian prisoner being visited by the consul.

So one day I was taken up to the governor's office, and he said to me, 'You're French, so why do you appeal to the Belgian consul?'

Sitting there in an armchair with a briefcase on his knee there was a gentleman of about fifty: dressed in white, fair, almost white hair; round, fresh, pink face. I grasped the position at once. 'You're the one who says I'm French. I admit I escaped from a French prison, but for all that I'm Belgian.'

'There, you see!' said the little man with a face like a priest.

'Why didn't you say so, then?'

'As far as I could see it had nothing to do with you, because I've not really committed any serious crime on your territory, apart from escaping, which is natural for any prisoner.'

'Bueno. I'll put you with your friends. But, Señor Consul, I warn you that at the first hint of an escape I put him back where he comes from. Take him to the barber and then put him in with his friends.'

'Thank you, Monsieur le Consul,' I said in French, 'thank you very much for having taken this trouble for me.'

'God above! How you must have suffered in that horrible black-hole. Go quickly before this brute changes his mind. I'll come again and see you. Good-bye.'

The barber wasn't there and they took me straight to my friends. I must have looked rather old-fashioned because they never stopped saying, 'Is it really you? It's not possible. What have those swine done to make you look like this? Speak - say something. Are you blind? What's wrong with your eyes? Why do you keep blinking them like that?'

'Because I can't get used to this light. It's too bright for me.'

My eyes are used to the dark.' I sat down, looking towards the inner part of the cell. 'It's better this way.'

'You smell of rot. It's unbelievable. Even your body smells rotten.'

I stripped and they put my things over by the door. My arms, back, legs and thighs were covered with red bites, like the bites of our bugs at home, and with the places where the tiny crabs that came in with the tide had nipped me. I was horrible: I didn't need a mirror to realize that. These five convicts had seen a good deal, but now they stopped talking, shocked at the state I was in. Clousiot called a warder and said although the barber wasn't there, there was water in the yard. The other told him to wait until it was time to go out.

I went out stark naked. Clousiot brought the clean clothes I was going to put on. With Maturette helping me, I washed and rewashed myself with the black soap of those parts. The more I washed, the more filth came off. At last, after several soapings and rinsings, I felt clean. The sun dried me in five minutes and I put on my clothes. The barber came. He wanted to crop my head: I said, 'No. Cut my hair in the ordinary way and shave me. I'll pay.'

'How much?'

'A peso.'

'Do it well,' said Clousiot, 'and I'll give you two.'

Washed, shaved, with properly cut hair and clean clothes, I felt myself coming to life again. My friends never stopped questioning me - 'And how high did the water come? What about the rats? What about the centipedes? And the mud? And the crabs? And the shit in the pails and the corpses they took out? Were they natural deaths or guys who'd hanged themselves? Or were they police suicides?'

The questions never stopped and so much talking made me thirsty. There was a coffee-seller in the yard. During the three hours we stayed there I drank at least ten strong coffees, sweetened with papelon (brown sugar). This coffee seemed to me the world's finest drink. The Negro of the black-hole opposite came and talked to me. In an undertone he told me about the business of his mother and the Belgian consul. I shook him by the hand. He was very proud of having been at the prison of my getting out. He went off as happy as can be.

'We'll have another talk tomorrow. That's enough for now.'

My friends' cell looked to me like a place where the hammock he'd bought with his own money. He made me lie in it. I stretched out crossways. He was amazed, and I told him that the reason he lay longways was that he just didn't know how to use a hammock.

Our days and part of our nights were filled with eating, drinking, playing draughts, playing cards with a Spanish pack, talking Spanish between ourselves and with the Colombian police and prisoners so as to learn the language well. Having to go to bed at nine was not so good. As I lay there all the details of the break right the way from the hospital at Saint-Laurent to Santa Marta came crowding before my eyes; and they called for a continuation. The film couldn't stop there; it had to go on. It'll go on all right. Just let me get my strength back and believe me there'll be more of the story. I found my little arrows and two coca leaves, one completely dry and the other with still a little green. I chewed the green one. They all watched me, astonished. I explained that these were the leaves cocaine was made of,

'You're kidding.'

'Taste.'

'Well, yes: it does numb your lips and tongue.'

'Do they sell it here?'

'Don't know. How do you manage to produce cash, Clou-siot?'

'I changed some in Rio Hacha, and since then I've always had it openly.'

'As far as I'm concerned,' I said, 'I've got thirty-six hundred-peso gold pieces with the governor, and each coin's worth three hundred pesos. One of these days I'll bring the matter up.'

'Why not offer him a deal? They're all broke.'

'You may have something there.'

On Sunday I talked to the Belgian consul and the Belgian prisoner. The prisoner had swindled an American banana firm. The consul said he'd do all he could to protect us. He filled in a form saying I was born of Belgian parents in Brussels. I told him about the nuns and the pearls. But he was a Protestant and he knew nothing about priests or nuns: he was very slightly acquainted with the bishop. As for the coins, he advised me not to ask for them. It was too dangerous. He would have to be told twenty-four hours before we left for Baranquilla 'and then you might claim them in my presence.'

That was my last try. I was never going to talk to anyone about escaping again.

That afternoon I saw the prison governor passing by. He stopped, looked at me, and said, 'How are you?'

'I'm all right - but I'd be better if I had my gold pieces.'

'Why?'

'Because then I could afford to pay a lawyer.'

'Come with me.' And he took me into his office. We were alone. He gave me a cigar - so far so good - and lit it for me - better and better. 'Can you speak Spanish well enough to understand and answer properly if I speak slow?'

'Yes.'

'Good. So you tell me you'd like to sell your twenty-six coins?'

'No, my thirty-six coins.'

'Ah, yes, yes. And to pay a lawyer with the money? But there are only the two of us who know you possess these coins.'

'No, there's the sergeant and the five men who arrested me and the deputy-governor who received them before handing them over to you. And then there's my consul.'

'Ha, ha! Bueno. It's really better that plenty of people should know about it - that way we can act right out in the open. You know, man, I've done you a great favour. I've kept quiet. I didn't pass on the requests to the other police chiefs asking whether they knew of any theft of gold coins.'

'But you should have.'

'No. From your point of view it was better not to.'

'Thank you, Governor.'

'You want me to sell them for you?'

'For how much?'

'Why, at the price you told me you'd sold three for - three hundred pesos. You can give me one hundred pesos each for doing you this service. What do you say to that?'

'No. You give me back the coins in lots of ten and I'll give you not a hundred pesos apiece, but two hundred. That'll pay back all you've done for me.'

'Frenchman, you're too sharp. As for me, I'm just a poor Colombian officer, too trusting and not very bright; but you're really intelligent. And too sharp, as I've already said.'

'OK, mate. What reasonable kind of an offer have you got to make, then?'

Cesario. I am sure he will most scrupulously pass them on to me. This letter will be a sufficient receipt.

Yours, etc.

As the convent was five miles from Santa Marta the car was back in an hour and a half. The governor sent for me.

'Here we are. Count them and see if any are missing.'

I counted them. Not to see if any were missing, because I didn't know how many there had been in the first place, but to know how many there were now, in the hands of this brute. Five hundred and seventy-two.

'Right?'

'Yes.'

'No falta? (None missing?)'

'No. Now tell me what happened.'

'When I got to the convent, there was the Mother Superior in the courtyard. With a policeman on either side of me I said, "Madame, I must speak to the Irish nun in your presence about a very serious matter whose nature you will guess, no doubt."'

'What then?'

'The nun trembled as she read the letter to the Mother Superior. The Superior said nothing. She bowed her head, opened the drawer of her desk and said to me, "Here's the bag and its pearls, untouched. May God forgive the person who was guilty of such a crime against that man. Tell him we pray for him." So there you are, hombre!' ended the governor, beaming.

'When do we sell the pearls?'

'Mañana (tomorrow). I don't ask you where they come from: I know you're a dangerous matador (killer), but now I also know you're a man of your word and that you're straight. Here, take this ham and wine and French bread with you and drink to this memorable day with your friends.'

'Good night.'

And I came back with a two-litre bottle of Chianti, a seven-pound smoked ham and four long French loaves. It was a banquet. The ham, bread and wine shrank fast. Everybody ate and drank heartily.

'Do you think the lawyer will be able to do something for us?'

I burst out laughing. Poor souls – even they had fallen for that crap about the lawyer. 'I don't know. We must think it over and consider before paying.'

'The best would be to pay only if it works,' said Clousiot.

'That's right. We must find a lawyer who'll agree to that.' And I didn't talk about it any more. I was slightly ashamed.

The next day the Lebanese came back. 'It's very complicated,' he said. 'To begin with the pearls have to be sorted according to size, then by colour, and then by shape – according to whether they're round or baroque.' In short it was not only complicated, but into the bargain the Lebanese said he'd have to bring another possible buyer who knew more about it than he did. In four days the business was finished. He paid thirty thousand pesos. At the last moment I withdrew one pink and two black pearls as a present for the Belgian consul's wife. As good businessmen they at once said that those three pearls alone were worth five thousand pesos. I kept them nevertheless.

The Belgian consul made a fuss about taking the pearls: but he was quite willing to keep the fifteen thousand pesos for me. So there I was in possession of twenty-seven thousand pesos. Now it was a question of carrying the third deal through.

How was I to set about it? What was the right angle? In Colombia a good workman earned between eight and ten pesos a day. So twenty-seven thousand was a lot of money. I must strike while the iron was hot. The governor had had twenty-three thousand pesos. With this twenty-seven thousand on top of it, he'd have fifty thousand.

'Governor, think of a business that would let a man live better than you do – what would it cost?'

'A good business, money down, would cost forty-five to sixty thousand pesos.'

'And what would it bring in? Three times what you get? Four times?'

'More. It'd bring in five or six times my pay.'

'Then why don't you become a businessman?'

'I'd need twice as much capital as I've got now.'

'Listen, Governor, I can suggest a third deal.'

'Don't play the fool with me.'

'No: I'm serious. Do you want my twenty-seven thousand pesos? They're yours whenever you like.'

'What do you mean?'

'Let me go.'

'Look, Frenchman, I know you don't trust me. Before, maybe you were right. But now I've escaped from poverty, or close on; and now I can buy a house and send my children to a paying school. And it's all thanks to you, so now I'm your friend: I don't want to rob you and I don't want you to be killed: I can't do anything for you here, not even for a fortune. I can't help you make a break with any chance of success whatsoever.'

'And what if I prove that that's not true?'

'Why, then we'll see: but think about it thoroughly first.'

'Governor, have you a friend who's a fisherman?'

'Yes.'

'Maybe he could take me out to sea and sell me his boat?'

'I don't know.'

'What would his boat be worth, roughly?'

'Two thousand pesos.'

'Suppose I give him seven thousand and you twenty thousand, would that be all right?'

'Frenchman, ten thousand's enough for me. Keep something for yourself.'

'You go ahead and fix it.'

'You going alone?'

'No.'

'How many?'

'Three altogether.'

'Let me talk to my fisherman friend.'

I was astonished at this character's change towards me. He had a villainous murdering face, but there were some fine things hidden far down in his heart.

In the yard I spoke to Clousiot and Maturette. They said for me to do as I thought best: they were ready to follow. This way of putting their lives into my hands gave me an immense satisfaction. I'd never let them down. I'd be extraordinarily cautious, for I'd taken a great responsibility on my shoulders. But I had to tell our other friends. We'd just finished a domino tournament. It was close on nine o'clock at night. It was the last moment we could still get any coffee. I called 'Cafetero!' and ordered six piping hot coffees.

'There's something I've got to say to you. I think I'm going to be able to make a break again. Unfortunately only three of us can go. It's natural I should take Clousiot and Maturette, the ones I escaped from penal with. If any of you have anything to say against it, let him speak out. I'll listen.'

'No,' said the Breton. 'It's fair enough, whichever way you look at it. To begin with because you all set off from penal together. And then because you'd never have been in this hole if we hadn't wanted to land in Colombia. But still thanks for asking what we think about it, Papillon. Of course you've got the right to do what you say; and I truly hope to God you bring it off, because if you don't it's certain death. And with very fancy trimmings, too.'

'We know that,' said Clousiot and Maturette together.

The governor spoke to me that afternoon. His friend was all right. He asked what we wanted to take with us in the boat.

'A ten-gallon keg of fresh water, fifty pounds of maize flour and ten pints of oil. That's all.'

'Carajol!' exclaimed the governor. 'You'll take to the sea with no more than that?'

'Yes.'

'You're brave, really brave.'

It was in the bag. He was determined to go through with this third deal. Quietly he added, 'Whether you believe it or not, friend, I'm doing this for my children in the first place, and then for you. You deserve it for your bravery.'

I knew it was true, and I thanked him.

'How are you going to manage so that my help doesn't show too much?'

'You won't be involved. I'll leave at night, when the deputy-governor's on duty.'

'What's your plan?'

'You must begin by reducing the night-guard by one man. Then three days later you take off another. When there's only one left you set up a sentry-box opposite the cell door. The first rainy night he'll take shelter in the box and I'll get out by the window behind. As for the lights round the wall, you'll have to find some way of short-circuiting them yourself. That's all I ask you to do. You can do it by tying two stones to a length of copper wire and tossing it over the two electric wires that run from the pole to the row of lights on the top of the wall. As for the fisherman, he must moor the boat by a padlocked chain, with the padlock already forced so I shan't lose any time, the sails ready to be hoisted and three big paddles to get us out into the wind.'

'But there's a little motor,' said the governor.

'Ah? So much the better. Let him have it ticking over as though he was warming it up and go to the nearest café for a drink. When he sees us coming, he's to stand by the boat in a black oilskin.'

'What about the money?'

'I'll cut your twenty thousand pesos in two - dividing each note. I'll pay the fisherman his seven thousand in advance. I'll give you half the twenty thousand beforehand, and one of the Frenchmen that stays behind - I'll tell you which - will give you the other half.'

'You don't trust me then? That's bad.'

'No, it's not that I don't trust you; but you might muck up the short-circuiting, and then I shan't pay, because without the short-circuit there's no getting out.'

'OK.'

Everything was ready. Through the governor I had given the fisherman his seven thousand pesos. For the last five days there had been no more than a single man on guard. The sentry-box was there and we were only waiting for the rain, which did not come. The bar had been sawn through with blades the governor had supplied and the cut well camouflaged: what's more, it was completely hidden by a cage with a parrot in it - a bird that was just beginning to say 'Shit' in French. We were all on hot bricks. The governor had been given the half notes. Every night there we were, waiting. It would not rain. One hour after the start of a downpour the governor was supposed to short-circuit the current from the outside. Not a single drop: at this time of year it was utterly unbelievable. The smallest cloud seen through our bars at about the right time filled us with hope: but then nothing ever came. It was enough to drive you crazy. For sixteen days now everything had been ready - sixteen nights of waiting up, our hearts in our mouths. One Sunday-morning the governor himself came into the yard to fetch me. He took me to his office: there he handed me back the bundle of half notes and three thousand uncut pesos.

'What's the matter?'

'Frenchman, my friend, you've only got tonight. At six o'clock tomorrow you leave for Baranquilla. I'm only giving you back three thousand of the fisherman's pesos because he spent the rest. If God sends rain tonight the fisherman will be waiting for you and you can give him the money when you take the boat. I trust you: I know there's nothing to be afraid of.'

It did not rain.

Breaks at Baranquilla

At six o'clock in the morning eight soldiers and two corporals, commanded by a lieutenant, put handcuffs on us and loaded us into an army lorry for Baranquilla. We did the hundred and twenty-five miles in three and a half hours. By ten we were at the prison they call 'Eighty', in the Calle Medellin at Baranquilla. Such a great deal of effort not to go to Baranquilla, and yet for all that here we were! It was a big town. The chief Atlantic port in Colombia, but lying high up in the estuary of the Rio Magdalena. As for the prison, it was a big one too: four hundred prisoners and close on a hundred warders. It was run just like any European gaol. Two surrounding walls, twenty-five feet high and more.

The top men of the prison welcomed us, with Don Gregorio, the governor, at their head. The prison was organized round four courtyards, two one side and two the other. They were separated by a long chapel where they had services and which also acted as a visiting-room. They put us into the 'highly dangerous' yard. When we were searched they found the twenty-three thousand pesos and the little arrows. I thought it my duty to warn the governor they were poisoned, which hardly made us look like model citizens.

'These Frenchmen even go so far as to carry poisoned arrows!'

For us, being in the Baranquilla prison was the most dangerous point in our whole break. Here we were to be handed over to the French authorities. Yes, Baranquilla (and for us that just meant its huge prison) was the turning point. We must escape whatever it cost - we must stake everything.

Our cell stood in the middle of the yard. It wasn't a cell in any case, but a cage – a concrete roof sitting on top of thick iron bars, with the lavatory in one of the corners. There were about a hundred other prisoners; they were housed in cells built in the four walls surrounding this court, which was about twenty yards by forty; and they could see into the court through their bars. Each set of bars had a kind of metal eave to stop the rain coming into the cell. We six Frenchmen were the only ones to be lodged in this central cage, open day and night to the gaze of the prisoners and, even more, of the warders. We spent the daytime in the yard, from six in the morning until six at night. We could walk in and out of the cells as we liked. We could talk, walk and even eat in the yard.

Two days after we got there we were all six taken into the chapel, where we found the governor, a few police and seven or eight newspaper photographers.

'You escaped from the French penal settlement in Guiana?'

'We've never denied it.'

'What crime led each of you to be punished so severely?'

'That doesn't matter. What does matter is that we've committed no crime on Colombian territory and that your nation is not only refusing us the right to remake our lives but is acting the part of man-hunters or gendarmes for the French government.'

'Colombia feels that she should not accept you on her territory.'

'But I myself and two other comrades were and still are perfectly determined not to live in this country. We were all three arrested far out at sea, not trying to land here at all. On the contrary, we were doing everything we possibly could to get away.'

'The French,' said the journalist belonging to a Catholic paper, 'are almost all Catholics, like us Colombians.'

'It may well be that you people are baptized Catholics, but your way of carrying on is very far from Christian.'

'What do you have against us?'

'You collaborate with the gaolers who are hunting us down. Even worse, you're doing their work for them. You've taken away our boat and everything in it – it all belonged to us, being a present from the Catholics of the island of Curaçao, so magnificently represented by Bishop Irénée de Bruyne. We can't think it right that you should refuse us a chance of redeeming ourselves; and even more than that, you stop us going to some other country at no expense to anyone else – some other country that might perhaps take the risk. That we think is really very wrong.'

'So you're angry with us – you're angry with the Colombians?'

'Not with the Colombians as such, but with their police and legal system.'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean that any mistake can be put right with good will. Allow us to set off by sea for some other country.'

'We'll try to get you permission.'

When we were back in the yard Maturette said to me, 'Well, did you get that? No kidding ourselves this time, man. We're in a hell of a tight corner, and it's not going to be easy to get out of it.'

'Listen,' I said, 'I don't know whether we'd be stronger if we were united, but what I have to say is each can do what he thinks best. As for me, I just have to break out of this Eighty of theirs.'

On Thursday I was called into the visiting-room and there I saw a well-dressed man of about forty-five. I looked at him hard. He was curiously like Louis Dega.

'You're Papillon?'

'Yes.'

'I'm Joseph, Louis Dega's brother. I've seen the papers and I've come to visit you.'

'Thanks.'

'Did you see my brother in Guiana? Did you know him at all?'

I told him exactly what had happened to Dega up until the day we parted in the hospital. He told me his brother was now on the Iles du Salut, a piece of news that had reached him from Marseilles. Visits took place in the chapel, on Thursdays and Sundays. He told me that in Baranquilla there were a dozen Frenchmen who had come to seek their fortune with their women. They were all ponces. There was a special district in the town, where some eighteen whores kept up the best French traditions of refined and skilful prostitution. It was always the same kind of men and the same kind of women from Cairo to the Lebanon, from England to Australia, from Buenos Aires to Caracas, Saigon to Brazzaville, who peddled their ancient speciality, the oldest in the world, prostitution and how to live off it handsomely.

Joseph Dega told me something pretty quaint: Baranquilla's French ponces were troubled in their minds. They were afraid our coming to the prison here might disturb their peace and damage their prosperous trade. And in fact, if one of us got out, or several of us, the police would go and look for them in the French girls' casetas, even if the escaped man had never been there to ask for help. And that might lead indirectly to the police finding out plenty - phony papers, out-of-date or cancelled residence permits, and so on. If they were looking for us they would also check identity-cards and permits. And if some of the women, and even some of the men, were found, it might be very bad for them.

So now I knew just where I was. He added that as far as he was concerned he'd do absolutely anything I asked and he'd come and see me on Thursdays and Sundays. I thanked him: he was a decent fellow and subsequent events showed he really meant what he said. He also told me that according to the papers France had been granted our extradition.

'Well, gents, I've plenty of news for you.'

'What?' cried all five of them in chorus.

'No illusions for us, to begin with. Our extradition is fixed. A special boat is coming from French Guiana to take us back where we came from. Next, our being here is worrying the ponces - French ponces who have settled comfortably in this town. Not the one who came to see me. He doesn't give a damn for what happens, but the other members of the union are afraid that if one of us escapes it may make things awkward for them.'

They all burst out laughing: they thought I meant to be funny. Clousiot said, 'Please, Monsieur Poncio Pilate, may I have your permission to escape?'

'It's not a joke. If any of the tarts come and visit us we must tell them not to come any more. Right?'

'Right.'

As I've said, there were about a hundred Colombian prisoners in our yard. They were by no means fools. There were some really skilful thieves, some elegant forgers, really bright confidence-men, hold-up specialists, drug peddlars and a few highly trained killers - it is a very commonplace calling in America, but these were really practised types. In those parts wealthy men and successful adventurers hire them to act on their account.

There were skins of every colour. From the African black of the Senegalese to the tea-colour of our Martinique Creoles, and from Indian red with blue-black hair to pure white. I made contacts. I tried to gauge the powers and the will to escape of some few picked men. Most were like me – they either feared a long sentence or already had one, and they lived in a continual state of readiness for a break.

Along the top of the four walls of this rectangular court there ran a sentinel's walk that was brilliantly lit by night and that had a little tower at each corner to hold a sentry. So there were four of them on duty day and night, with an extra man in the yard, by the chapel door. This one had no weapons. The food was quite good and many of the prisoners sold things to eat or drink – coffee or fruit-juice – orange, pineapple, pawpaw, etc. – that came in from outside. Every now and then one of these traders would be the victim of an astonishingly rapid attack. Before he knew what was happening there he would be with a big towel wrapped tight round his face to stop him crying out and a blade in his back or at his throat that was ready to go in deep at the slightest resistance. The victim's takings would be gone before he could say knife. As the towel came off so he'd get a crack on the back of the neck. Nobody ever said a word, whatever happened. Sometimes the trader would put his things away – shutting up shop, as it were – and try to find who it was who'd done it. If he did, then there was a fight: with the knife, always.

Two Colombian thieves came to me with a suggestion. I listened very closely. It seemed that in the town there were some police who were also thieves. When they were on duty in a given district, they would tell their accomplices so they could come out and do business there.

My two visitors knew them all, and they told me it would be very unlucky if one of these men didn't come during that week to stand guard at the chapel door. I'd have to get a revolver brought in to me at visiting time. The police-thief wouldn't mind being what he'd call forced to knock on the door leading out of the chapel: this gave on to a little guard-room with four or at the most six men in it. Surprised by us, threatened with the revolver, they couldn't stop us getting out into the street. And then all you'd have to do would be to lose yourself in the traffic, which was pretty dense just there.

I didn't much care for the scheme. If the revolver had to be hidden, it couldn't be a very big one – a 6.35 at the most. With a gun like that there was the danger the guards wouldn't be frightened enough. Or one of them might turn awkward and you'd have to kill him. I said no.

I wasn't the only one to be on fire to do something: there were my friends too. But there was this difference. After a few days of being very low they came round to accepting the idea that the boat coming for us should find us here in the prison. There was no great distance between that and accepting defeat. They even talked about what we might get in the way of punishment back in Guiana, and how we'd be treated there.

'The very sound of all this crap makes me sick,' I said. 'If you want to talk about that sort of future, do it without me: go and discuss it somewhere where I'm not. Only a eunuch would put up with what you call our fate. Are you eunuchs? Is there one of us who's had his balls cut off? If so, just let me know, will you? Because I'll tell you what, mates: when I think of a break out of here, I think of a break for us all. If my brain's bursting with trying to work out just how to set about getting out, it's because I mean us all to get out. And six men – it's not so easy. And I'll tell you something more: as far as I'm concerned – just me – it's easy. If I see the date coming too close and nothing done, I kill a Colombian cop to gain time. They won't hand me back to France if I've killed one of their cops for them. Then I'll have time and to spare. And as I'll be alone, a break will be all the easier.'

The Colombians worked out another scheme, not at all badly put together. At mass on Sunday morning the chapel was always full of visitors and prisoners. First everybody heard mass together, and then when the service was over the prisoners who had visitors stayed on in the chapel. The Colombians asked me to go to mass on Sunday to get a thorough idea of how it was run, so that we could plan our action for the following week. They asked me to lead the revolt. But I refused the honour: I didn't know the men who were to take part well enough.

I said that of the four Frenchmen, the Breton and the flat-iron man didn't want to join. No difficulty there. All they had to do was not to go to church. On Sunday the four of us who were in the plot would go to mass. The chapel was rectangular: the choir at the far end: a door at either side giving on to the two yards. The main door opened into the guard-room: it had bars, and behind the bars there were a score of warders. And lastly, behind them, there was the gate into the street. As the chapel was crammed, the warders left the barred door open, and while the service was going on they stood there in a tight-packed line. Two men were to come in with the visitors; and weapons were to be brought in at the same time. They were to be brought by women, carrying them between their legs: they would pass them on to the men once everybody was inside. Two heavy revolvers – 38 or 45. A woman would give one to the leader of the plot and then get out right away. The moment the choir boy tinkled his little bell the second time we were all to attack together. I was to put a huge knife to the governor's throat and say, 'Don Gregorio, da la orden de nos dejar pasar, si no, te mato (give the order to let us pass or I will kill you).'

Another man was to do the same to the priest. From different angles the three others were to train their guns on the warders standing at the barred main door of the chapel. Orders to shoot the first screw who wouldn't throw down his weapons. The unarmed men were to get out first. The priest and the governor would act as a shield for the rearguard. If all went well, the warders' rifles would be on the ground. The men with guns were to make the warders go into the chapel. We'd get out, first closing the barred door and then the wooden one. The guard-room would be empty, because all the men were required to be standing there in the chapel, hearing mass. Fifty yards from the entrance there would be a lorry waiting, with a little ladder behind to get in quicker. It would set off only when the leader had got in. He was to be the last. When I had seen how the mass went, I agreed. Everything had happened just as Fernando had told me.

Joseph Dega was not to come and see me on Sunday. He knew why. He was to get us a car disguised as a taxi so we shouldn't have to get into the lorry, and it would take us to a hide-out that he was also going to get ready. I was all keyed up the whole week, impatient to get moving. Fernando managed to get a revolver in by another route. It was a Colombian Civil Guard 45, a really formidable weapon. On Thursday one of Joseph's women came to see me. She was very sweet; she told me the taxi would be yellow - we couldn't miss it.

'OK. Thanks.'

'Good luck.' She kissed me prettily on both cheeks and it seemed to me she was quite moved.

'Entra, entra. Come in and fill this chapel, to hear God's word,' said the priest.

Clousiot could scarcely hold himself in. Maturette's eyes were sparkling and the other man kept right there by me, not an inch away. I was perfectly calm as I went to my place. Don Gregorio, the governor, was there, sitting on a chair next to a fat woman. I was standing against the wall. Clousiot on my right: the two others on my left, dressed so that people wouldn't notice us if we managed to get out into the street. My knife was open and ready, lying along my right forearm. It was held by a strong rubber band and hidden by the sleeve of my khaki shirt, carefully buttoned at the wrist. It is at the moment of the elevation, when everyone bends his head as though he were looking for something, that the choir-boy, having in the first place jangled his little bell, then clicks it three distinct times. The second of these was to be our signal. Each of us knew just what he was to do.

First clink: second . . . I flung myself upon Don Gregorio and clapped the big knife to his long, wrinkled neck. The priest shrieked, 'Misericordia, no me mata (Don't kill me, for pity's sake).' Without seeing them, I could hear the three others ordering the warders to throw down their rifles. Everything was going well. I took Don Gregorio by the collar of his fine suit and said, 'Sigue y no tengas miedo, no te haré daño (Follow me and don't be afraid: I'll do you no harm).'

The priest was held there with a razor to his throat, close to my group. Fernando said, 'Vamos, Francés, vamos a la salida (Let's go, Frenchman. Let's get out).'

Full of triumph and the joy of success I was shoving all my people towards the gate giving on to the street when two rifles went off at once. Fernando fell and so did one of the other armed men. I still pushed on for another yard, but the warders had recovered and they barred our way with their rifles. Fortunately there were some women between them and us - that prevented them from firing. Two other rifle shots, into the can. All the sentry had to do was to pull it up by the string. Now the box on the far right had a kind of little tower that jutted out somewhat over the yard. It occurred to me that if I could make a fair-sized grapnel and fix it to a plaited rope, it should catch there easily. In a few seconds I could get over the wall and into the street. Just one problem – coping with the sentry. How?

I saw him get up and take a few steps on the high wall. He looked as though he was overcome by the heat – struggling to keep awake. God above, that was it! He'd have to be put to sleep. First I'd make my rope, and then, if I could find a safe hook, I'd dope him and make a dash for it. Two days later I had about twenty feet of rope, made from all the strong linen shirts we could find, particularly the khaki ones. The hook had been fairly easy to come by. It was the thing that held up one of the metal eaves sheltering the cell doors from the rain. Joseph Dega brought me a bottle of a very strong sleeping-draught. The instructions said you were only to take ten drops at a time. The bottle held about six big spoonfuls. I got the sentry used to me giving him coffee. He would lower the can and I would send him up three coffees every time. As all Colombians love spirits and as the sleeping-draught tasted something like anis, I had a bottle of anis sent in.

I said to the sentry, 'Would you like a French coffee?'

'What's it like?'

'It's got anis in it.'

'I'll try. Let's taste it first.'

Several of them tasted my coffee with anis in it and now, when I offered them a cup, they'd say, 'French coffee!'

'All right,' and slosh, I'd pour in the anis.

Zero-hour came round. Noon, on a Saturday. A terrible heat was beating down. My friends knew it would be impossible for two to get over in time, but a Colombian with an Arabic name, Ali, said he'd come up behind me. I agreed. That would prevent any Frenchman from looking like an accomplice and therefore being punished. On the other hand, I couldn't have the rope and the hook on me, because the sentry would have plenty of time to inspect me while I was sending him up the coffee. We reckoned he'd be knocked out in five minutes.

Zero-hour less five minutes. I hailed the sentry. 'OK?'

'Yes.'

'Like a coffee?'

'Yes. French coffee — it's better.'

'Just a minute. I'll fetch some.' I went over to the cafetero. 'Two coffees.' I'd already poured the whole bottle of sleeping-stuff into the can. That'd stretch him out pretty flat! I went to the wall just under him, and he saw me pouring the anis in with a flourish. 'You want it strong?'

'Yes.'

I put in a little more and poured the whole lot into his can: he hauled it up straight away.

Five minutes went by. Ten, fifteen, twenty minutes! And still he wasn't asleep. Worse still, instead of sitting down he took a few paces to and fro, holding his rifle. Yet he had drunk the lot. And at one o'clock the guard would be changed.

On tenterhooks, I watched his every movement. There was nothing to show he was drugged at all. Ha, he'd stumbled! He sat down in front of his sentry-box with his rifle between his legs. His head drooped on to his shoulder. My friends and the two or three Colombians who knew what was up watched his motions as intently as I did.

'Go ahead,' I said to the Colombian. 'The rope!'

He was getting ready to throw it when the guard stood up, dropped his rifle, stretched, and stamped as though he were marking time. The Colombian stopped just before he was seen. Eighteen minutes left before the changing of the guard. Now, in my mind, I began calling for God's help. 'I beg You to help me just once more. I beg You not to abandon me!' But it was in vain I called on this God of the Christians, so awkward sometimes, particularly for me, an atheist.

'It's unbelievable,' said Clousiot, coming close. 'It's unbelievable the bloody fool doesn't go to sleep!'

The sentry went to pick up his rifle, and just as he was bending over it he fell his full length on the walk, as though he had been struck down. The Colombian flung the hook, but it did not take and it fell back again. He threw it up a second time. It held. He tugged to see if it was firm. I checked it and just as I got my feet against the wall to take the first heave and start climbing Clousiot said, 'Hold it! Here's the new guard.'

I just had time to get away before I was seen. With the protective instinct and spirit of solidarity you find among prisoners, a dozen Colombians quickly surrounded me, mixing me in their crowd. We walked away along the wall, leaving the rope hanging there. A man in the new guard caught sight of the grapnel and at the same moment the unconscious sentry lying over his rifle. He ran two or three yards and pressed the alarm, convinced there'd been an escape.

They came for the unconscious man with a stretcher. There were more than twenty police up there on the walk. There was Don Gregorio with them, having the rope hauled up. He had the grapnel in his hand. A few moments later the yard was surrounded by police, their guns pointing. There was a roll-call. After answering to his name, each man had to go back into his cell. Surprise! No one missing! Everyone was locked in, each in his own cell.

Second roll-call and check, cell by cell. No. Nobody had disappeared. At about three o'clock we were let out into the yard again. We heard that the sentry was still snoring, flat out, and nothing they could do would wake him. My Colombian accomplice was as shattered as I was. He had been so sure it was going to work! He raged against everything American, for the sleeping-draught had come from the States.

'What's to be done?'

'Why, start again, hombre!' That's all I could find to say to him. He thought I meant 'start doping another sentry', whereas what I was thinking was, 'Let's find some other way'.

He said, 'Do you think these warders are such simpletons that you'll find another to drink your French coffee?'

Although this was a tragic moment, I could not help laughing. 'Sure, man, sure.'

The sentry slept three days and four nights. When at last he woke up, of course he said it was certainly me who had put him out with my French coffee. Don Gregorio sent for me and brought us face to face. The commander of the guard went to hit me with his sword. I leapt into a corner and defied him. He raised the sabre. Don Gregorio stepped between us, took the blow full on his shoulder and went down. His collar-bone was broken. He screamed so loud the officer had no time for any one but him. He picked him up. Don Gregorio roared for help. All the civilian employees came racing in from the nearby offices. The commander, two other policemen and the sentry in question had a pitched battle against a dozen civilians who were trying to avenge their governor. Several men were slightly wounded in this tangana. The only one not to be hurt was me. The great thing was, this was no longer my

The dark of the moon came round. The sergeant and the two sentries had received the halves of the note due to each. This time I didn't have to cut them — they were in two already. They were to go and fetch the other halves in the Barrio Chino, at the house where Joseph Dega's woman lived.

The lights went out. We set about the bar. It was sawn through in under ten minutes. We left the cell, wearing dark shirts and trousers. As we went the Colombian joined us. Apart from a black slip he was completely naked. Reaching the wall, I climbed the bars of the gate of the calabozo (cell or prison), got round the overhanging eave and threw the grapnel with its three yards of rope. In under three minutes I was up on the sentry's walk without having made a sound. Lying there flat I waited for Clousiot. The night was pitch dark. Suddenly I saw or rather sensed a hand reaching up; I caught hold and heaved. Instantly there was a terrifying noise. Clousiot had climbed between the eave and the wall and had got caught: it was the top of his trousers hooked up in the metal. At the sound I stopped pulling, of course. The metallic row stopped. Once more I heaved, thinking Clousiot must have got free, and in the midst of the shattering din of this zinc sheet I hoisted him up by main force on to the top of the wall.

Rifle-fire from the other sentries, but not from ours. Badly rattled by the shots we jumped in the wrong place, down into a street that was thirty feet below whereas to the right there was one with a drop of only fifteen. Result: Clousiot broke his right leg again. I couldn't get up either — both my feet were broken. Later I was told it was the heel bones. As for the Colombian, he put his knee out. The rifle fire brought the guard out into the street. We were surrounded with rifles pointing at us, under the light of a big electric torch. I wept with fury. To add to it all, the guards would not believe I couldn't get up. So it was on my knees, crawling as they banged me with their bayonets, that I went back into the prison. Clousiot hopped on one foot, and the Colombian did the same. My head was bleeding horribly from a blow with a rifle-butt.

The firing had woken Don Gregorio, who was sleeping in his office, being on duty that night, luckily for us. If it hadn't been for him they would have finished us off with their rifle-butts and bayonets. The one who battered me most savagely was that very sergeant I'd paid for laying on the two sentries. Don Gregorio put an end to this massacre. He threatened to oring them before the courts if they hurt us seriously. These magic words quite took away their strength.

The next day Clousiot's leg was put in plaster at the hospital. A bone-setter doing time with us put the Colombian's knee back and strapped it. During the night my feet swelled until they were the size of my head, all red and black with blood and extraordinarily puffy: the doctor had my feet bathed in luke-warm salt water and then put leeches to them three times a day. When they were full of blood the leeches dropped off of themselves and they were put into vinegar to make them bring it up again. The wound in my head needed six stitches.

A journalist who was short of news brought out an article about me. He said I was the leader of the rising in the church, that I had 'poisoned' a sentry, and that now I had organized a mass break, with outside accomplices, for sure, since the whole district's light had been cut off by someone tampering with the transformer. 'Let us hope that France will rid us of her number one gangster as soon as possible,' he ended.

Joseph came to see me, bringing his wife Annie. The sergeant and the three guards had all come separately for the other halves of their notes. Annie asked me what she ought to do. I said to pay, since they had kept their word. Our failure wasn't their fault.

For a week now they had been trundling me about the yard in an iron wheelbarrow - it acted as my bed. I lay there, with my feet high, resting on a band of cloth fixed to two uprights on the shafts. It was the only possible position, if I didn't want to suffer too much. My huge, swollen feet, stiff with clot-ted blood, could not bear their own weight, even when I was lying down. In my barrow I felt it somewhat less. A fortnight after I broke them they had come down to half their size and I was X-rayed. The two heel bones were broken. I'd be flat-footed for the rest of my days.

Today's paper said the boat that was coming for us would arrive at the end of the month, bringing an escort of French police. The paper said she was called the Mana. It was 12 October. We had eighteen days left and we had to play our last card. But what card could we play with my broken feet?

Joseph was in despair. When he came to see me he told me all the Frenchmen and all the women in the Barrio Chino were terribly upset at the idea that I was within a few days of being handed over to the French authorities, having struggled so for my freedom. The whole colony was deeply concerned about my fate. It was a great comfort to me to know all these men and their women were spiritually with me.

I'd quite given up my plan of killing a Colombian cop. In fact I could not bring myself to do away with the life of a man who had not hurt me in any way. It occurred to me he might have a father or a mother to keep – a wife and children. I smiled at the idea of having to find an evil-natured policeman who also had no family. For example, I might have to ask, 'If I murder you, is there really nobody who will miss you?' That morning of 13 October I had the blues very badly. I stared at some crystallized picric acid that was supposed to give me jaundice if I ate it. If I were sent to hospital maybe I could get myself taken out of it by men in Joseph's pay. The next day, the fourteenth, I was yellower than a lemon. Don Gregorio came to see me in the yard: I was in the shade, half lying in my barrow with my feet in the air. Straight away, without any precautions, I went to the point. 'Have me sent to hospital and there's ten thousand pesos in it for you.'

'Frenchman, I'll try. No, not so much for the ten thousand pesos, but because it really grieves me to see you struggling so for your freedom, and all in vain. Only I don't think they'll keep you there, because of that article in the paper. They'll be afraid.'

One hour later the doctor sent me to the hospital. I didn't even touch the ground there. I was taken out of the ambulance on a stretcher, and after a very careful examination of my body and my urine I went right back to prison two hours later, without ever having got off my stretcher.

Now it was the nineteenth, a Thursday. Joseph's wife Annie came to see me, together with the wife of a Corsican. They brought cigarettes and some cakes and sweets. With their affectionate conversation these women did me an immense amount of good. The sight of their pure friendship, the loveliest of things, really turned this bitter day into a sunlit afternoon. I can never say how much good the solidarity of the underworld did me during my stay in the prison called Eighty. Nor how much I owe Joseph Dega, who went so far as to risk his freedom and his position to help me to escape.

But something Annie said gave me an idea. As we were talking she said. 'Papillon dear, you've done everything humanly possible to get free. Fate's been very hard on you. The only thing you haven't done is to blow Eighty sky high!

'And why not? Why shouldn't I blow up this old prison? It would be doing these Colombians a kindness. If I blow it up, perhaps they'll make up their minds to build a new, more sanitary place.'

I said farewell for ever to these charming young women, and as I embraced them I said to Annie, 'Tell Joseph to come and see me on Sunday.'

On Sunday the 22nd, Joseph was there. 'Look, you've got to move heaven and earth to get someone to bring me in a stick of dynamite, a detonator and a fuse on Thursday. On my side I'll do the necessary to get a drill and three brick-piercers.'

'What are you going to do?'

'I'm going to blow up the prison wall in full daylight. Promise the fake cab we talked about five thousand pesos. Let it be in the street behind the Calle Medellin every day from eight in the morning till six at night. He'll get five hundred pesos a day if nothing happens and five thousand if it does. I'll come with a strong Colombian carrying me on his back, through the hole the dynamite makes in the wall as far as the taxi - then it's up to him. If the fake cab is OK, send in the stick: if not, well that's the end - the very end, and no more hope.'

'Count on me,' said Joseph.

At five o'clock I had myself carried into the chapel. I said I wanted to pray alone. They took me there. I asked for Don Gregorio to come and see me. He came.

'Hombre, it's only a week now before you leave me.'

'That's why I asked you to come. You are holding fifteen thousand pesos of mine. I want to give them to my friend before I go so he can send them to my family. Please accept three thousand. I offer it to you sincerely, because you've always protected me from ill-treatment by the soldiers. And it would be kind if you gave me the money today, with a roll of sticky paper so I can fix them by Thursday and hand them over all in one piece.'

'Right.'

He came back and gave me twelve thousand pesos, still cut in halves. He kept three thousand. Back in my wheelbarrow I called the Colombian over into a quiet corner - the Colombian who'd gone with me last time. I told him my scheme and asked if he felt he was strong enough to carry me piggy-back the twenty or thirty yards to the taxi. He solemnly undertook to do so. So that was OK. I was carrying on as though I was sure Joseph would succeed. I stationed myself under the wash-house early on Monday morning, and Masurette (he and Clousiot always acted as chauffeurs for my barrow) went to fetch the sergeant I'd given the three thousand pesos to and who'd bashed me so savagely at the time of the last escape.

'Sergeant Lopez, I've got to talk to you.'

'What do you want?'

'For two thousand pesos I want a very strong three-speed drill and six brick piercers. Two quarter-inch, two half-inch and two three-quarter inch.'

'I've no money to buy them with.'

'Here's five hundred pesos.'

'You'll have them tomorrow, Tuesday, at the changing of the guard - one o'clock. Get two thousand pesos ready.'

At one o'clock on Tuesday I had the lot in an empty tin in the yard, a paper bin that was emptied at the changing of the guard. Pablo, the tough Colombian, collected them and hid them.

On Thursday the 26th, no Joseph. Just at the end of the visiting hour I was called. It was an old, deeply wrinkled Frenchman: Joseph's messenger. 'What you asked for is in this loaf of bread.'

'Here's the taxi's two thousand pesos. Five hundred for each day.'

'The driver's an old Peruvian, as game as a fighting-cock - you don't have to worry about him. Ciao.'

'Ciao.'

So that the loaf shouldn't attract notice, they'd put cigarettes, matches, smoked sausage, salami, butter and a bottle of black oil into the big paper bag. When it was being searched I gave the guard on the door a packet of cigarettes, some matches and two little sausages. He said, 'Let's have a bit of that bread.'

That really would have been the last straw. 'No. You'll have to buy bread. Look, here's five pesos - there wouldn't be enough here for all six of us.'

Christ, that was a near shave. What a fool to have thought of sausages! The wheelbarrow hurried away from that blundering ox of a guard at full speed. His asking for bread had so taken me aback I was still in a cold sweat.

'The fireworks are for tomorrow. Everything's here, Pablo. The hole's got to be made just under the overhang of the little tower. Then the sentry up there won't be able to see you.'

'But he'll hear.'

'I've taken care of that. At ten o'clock tomorrow that side of the yard will be in the shade. One of the metal-workers must flatten a sheet of copper, hammering it against the wall a few yards from us, out in the open. If there are two of them, so much the better. I'll give them five hundred pesos each. Find me two men for the job.'

He found them. 'Two friends of mine are going to beat copper non-stop. The sentry won't be able to make out the sound of the drill. But you'll have to be there in your barrow just beyond the overhang, talking with the other Frenchmen. That'll hide me a little from the sentry in the opposite corner.'

In an hour's time the hole was made. Thanks to the hammering of the copper and the oil an assistant poured on to the drill, the sentry never suspected a thing. The stick of dynamite was rammed into the hole together with its detonator and nine inches of fuse. The rest of the hole was stuffed with clay. We stood back. If all went well the explosion would blow a hole in the wall. The sentry and his sentry-box would come down and I, riding Pablo, would get through the gap and reach the taxi. The others would do the best they could on their own. It was reasonable that even if they came out after us, Clousiot and Maturette would reach the taxi first.

Just before lighting the fuse Pablo said to a group of Colombians, 'If you want to make a break, there'll be a hole in the wall in a few moments.'

'Fine. Because the police'll come running and shoot the ones behind - the ones that stand out most.'

The fuse was lit. A shattering crash shook the whole district. The little tower came down with the sentry on top of it. There were great cracks all over the wall, so wide you could see the street through them: but not one was wide enough for a man. No real gap had been made, and it was then - only then - that I admitted I was beaten. It was clearly my fate to go back to Guiana.

An indescribable turmoil followed this explosion. There were more than fifty police in the yard.

very well who was responsible. 'Bueno, Francés. This time is the very last, I believe.'

The commander of the garrison was out of his mind with fury. He couldn't give orders to strike a wounded man lying there in a wheelbarrow; and so as to prevent trouble for anyone else I called out that I'd done the whole thing myself, quite alone. Six warders in front of the shattered wall, six in the yard and six outside in the street: they stood guard there right round the clock until builders had repaired it. The sentry who came down with the tower had had the good luck not to be hurt.

Back to Guiana

Three days later, at eleven o'clock on the morning of 30 October, twelve French warders, dressed in white, came to take possession of us. Before we left there was a little official ceremony – each of us had to be checked and identified. They'd brought our measurements, finger-prints, photos and all the rest of it. Once the identification was over, the French consul came forward to sign a paper for the local judge – he being the person who was to officially hand us over to France. All the people there were astonished at the friendly way the screws treated us. No harshness, no rough words. The three who had been there longer than us knew several of them and talked and joked with them like old friends. Major Boursal, the leader of the escort, inquired into my condition: he looked at my feet and said I'd be taken care of on board – there was a good medical orderly in the group that had come to fetch us.

We travelled right down in the hold, and the voyage in this old tub was made really unpleasant by the stifling heat and the awkwardness of being coupled two by two in leg-irons that went right back to the days of the Toulon prison-hulks. There was only one incident worth recording. The boat had to coal at Trinidad: when we were in the harbour an English officer so fast. My friends did not say a word. The warders were glad to be back. During the voyage the sea had been rough and now many of them were happy to get away from it.

16 November 1934

An extraordinarily dense crowd at the landing-stage. You could feel they were full of curiosity to see these men who had not been afraid of going such a distance. And as the day of our arrival was a Sunday, it also provided a diversion for this community that didn't have so very much in that line. I heard people say, 'The wounded one is Papillon. There's Clousiot. The one behind is Maturette . . .' And so on.

Inside the prison enclosure, six hundred men were lined up in groups in front of their huts. Warders next to each group. The first man I recognized was François Sierra. He was weeping openly, without attempting to hide his tears. He was perched up at one of the windows of the infirmary, watching me. You could feel that his sorrow was genuine. We stopped in the middle of the square. The governor took a megaphone. 'Transportees, you see how pointless it is to escape. Every country arrests you and hands you back to France. Nobody wants you. So it's better to stay quietly here and behave properly. What have these five men in store for them? A heavy sentence that they'll have to serve in the solitary-confinement prison on the Ile Saint-Joseph and then, for the rest of their time, life internment on the islands. That's what they have gained by escaping. I hope you get the point. Warders, take these men to the punishment block.'

A few minutes later there we were in a special cell in the high-security wing. As soon as we got there I asked for my feet to be attended to – they were still very bruised and swollen. Clousiot said the plaster on his leg was hurting. We were trying it on . . . if only they'd send us to hospital! François Sierra appeared with his warder.

'Here's the orderly,' said the screw.

'How are you, Papi?'

'I'm sick: I want to go to hospital.'

'I'll try and get you in, but after what you did when you were there last, I'm afraid it's almost impossible. The same goes for Clousiot.' He massaged my feet and put on ointment: he checked Clousiot's plaster and then went away. We couldn't say anything because the screws were there, but his eyes expressed such good will that I was deeply moved.

'No, there's nothing to be done,' he told me the next day as he was massaging me again. 'Do you want me to get you into the big room? Are you put in irons at night?'

'Yes.'

'Then it's better you should go into the big room. You'll have the irons on still, but at least you won't be alone. And just now being alone must be horrible for you.'

'Right.'

Yes, at this moment loneliness was even harder to stand than before. I was in such a state of mind that I didn't even have to close my eyes to fly away and wander both in the past and the present. And as I couldn't walk, the punishment cell was even worse for me than it had been formerly.

Oh, here I was back on the road down the drain all right! And yet I had been able to get shot of it quick enough, and there I had been, flying over the sea towards freedom, towards the delight of being a new man, and towards my revenge, too. The debt those three owed me - Polein, police and prosecutor: I mustn't forget that. As for the trunk, there'd be no need to hand it to the flats on the gate at the Police Judiciaire. I'd go as a Cook's man with the company's elegant cap on my head. A big label on the trunk: Commissionnaire Divisionnaire Benoit, 36, quai des Orfèvres à Paris (Seine). I'd carry the trunk up to the orderly-room myself, and as I should have worked out that the alarm-clock wouldn't go off till I had left, it could not miss. The finding of this solution took a great weight off my mind. As for the prosecuting counsel, I had time and to spare to rip out his tongue. I had not decided quite how I should do it; but it was as good as done. That prostituted tongue, I'd tear it out bit by bit.

The very first thing to be done was to get my feet right. I must be able to walk as soon as possible. It would be three months before I came up for trial, and lots of things could stand you any more. But still, you're welcome here with us, and as you'll certainly mean to have another go, you can count on all of us to help you. Isn't that right, mates? You all agree?'

Every guy there agreed, and I thanked them all.

They were formidable characters; I could see that right away. Since we lived together so closely it was difficult for anyone not to let it be known whether he had a charger or not. And at night, when everyone was fixed to the same bar, it was not hard to kill a man without danger. All you had to do was to fix it so that, for a certain amount of cash, the Arab turnkey agreed not to close the shackle properly. So you could get up in the darkness, do what you intended to do, and then go quietly back and lie down in your place, taking care to lock the shackle thoroughly. As the Arab was in some degree an accomplice, he'd keep his trap shut.

It was three weeks now since I had been back. They had passed pretty briskly. I was starting to walk a little, holding the bar in the passage that separated the two lines of sleeping platforms. I was coming on. Last week, at the official inquiry, I saw the three hospital screws we knocked out and disarmed. They were very pleased we had come back and they had great hopes that some day we'd land up where they were on duty. Because after our break they'd all three been severely punished - their six months leave in Europe withheld and a year's colonial allowance on top of their pay withheld too. So ours was not the friendliest of meetings. We repeated their threats at the inquiry, so that they should be on the record.

The Arab behaved better. He just told the truth without any exaggeration, leaving out the part played by Maturette. The captain in charge of the inquiry pressed us very hard to find out who had provided the boat. We got into his bad books by telling unlikely tales, such as we made rafts ourselves, etc.

He told us that because of the attack on the warders, he'd do his very best to get Clousiot and me five years, and Maturette three. 'And since they call you Papillon,' he said, 'I'll trim your wings for you - you can rely on that. You're not likely to fly again for some time.'

I was very much afraid he was right. More than two months to wait before coming up in front of the court. I was ~~very~~ with myself for not having put one or two poisoned ~~...~~ tips into my charger. If I'd had them I might perhaps have been able to make a last dash for it in the punishment wing. I was making progress every day now: I was walking better and better. François Sierra never failed to come and massage my feet with camphorated oil morning and night. These massage-visits did an enormous amount of good, both to my feet and my spirit. How good it is to have a friend in life!

I noticed that such a long break as this gave us real standing with all the convicts. I was certain we were quite safe there among them. There was no danger of our being murdered for what we had. The great majority would not put up with it and it was certain that the guilty men would be killed. Everyone, without exception, respected us, and they even had a very real admiration for what we had done. And then again, our having knocked out the screws classed us as men who would stop at nothing. It's pleasant to feel quite safe.

Every day I walked a little farther, and the other men would often offer to massage not only my feet with the oil in a little bottle Sierra left me, but also the muscles of my legs, which were atrophying with such long disuse.

The Arab and the Ants

In this room there were two silent men who never spoke to anyone. They always kept very close together and they only talked between themselves, and even then in a low voice no one could hear. One day I offered one of them an American cigarette from a packet Sierra had brought me. He thanked me and then said, 'François Sierra's a friend of yours?'

'Yes. The best I have.'

'Maybe one day, if things go badly, we'll send you our legacy through him.'

'What legacy?'

'My friend and I have made up our minds that if they guillotine us, we'll send you our charger so you can use it to make another break. So we'll give it to Sierra to pass it on to you.'

'You think you'll get death?'

'It's pretty nearly sure: there's very little chance of our getting off.'

'If it's so certain you're going to be condemned to death, why are you in this big room?'

'I think they're afraid we'll commit suicide if either of us is alone in a cell.'

'Yes. Yes, that's possible. What did you do?'

'We gave an Arab to the flesh-eating ants. I tell you this, because unfortunately they've got certain proof. We were caught in the act.'

'And where did it happen?'

'At Kilometre Forty-Two, the death camp after Sparouine Creek.' His friend had come over to us: he was a man from Toulouse. I gave him a cigarette. He sat down next to his friend, opposite me.

'We've never asked anybody's opinion on the matter,' said the newcomer. 'But I'd rather like to know what you think of us.'

'Without knowing anything about you, how do you expect me to say whether you were right or wrong to give a living man, even if he was only an Arab, to the ants to eat? To tell you my opinion, I'd have to know the whole business from A to Z.'

'I'll tell you about it,' said the Toulousian. 'Kilometre Forty-Two is a logging camp forty-two kilometres from Saint-Laurent. The convicts there are forced to cut a cubic yard of hard-wood a day. You have to be there every evening in the bush, standing by the wood you have cut, neatly piled up. The warders, with Arab turnkeys with them, come and check that you've done your stint. When it's accepted, every cubic yard is marked with red, green or yellow paint. It's according to the day of the week. They'll pass the work if every bit is hard-wood. To manage it better, we two teamed up together. Pretty often, we couldn't reach the cubic yard. So then in the evening they'd put us in the punishment cell without anything to eat, and the next day, still without anything to eat they made us go back to work - we had to make up what was short the day before as well as cut this day's yard. We were being worked to death - they were treating us like dogs.'

'The longer it went on, the weaker we got and the less could manage the work. On top of that, they'd given us a special guard who wasn't a warder but an Arab. He came to the place we were working, sat there at his ease with his bull's pizzle between his legs and insulted us all the time. He ate, smacking his lips so as to make us feel really hungry. To put it in a word, it was non-stop hell. We had two chargers with three thousand francs in each, put by for our escape. One day we made up our minds to buy the Arab. That made the position even worse. Fortunately he always believed we only had one charger. His system was easy: for fifty francs, say, he'd let us go and steal from the heaps that had already been accepted the day before - we took the pieces that hadn't been painted and we made up our daily yard. This way he got nearly two thousand francs out of us, in goes of fifty or a hundred at a time.

'When we'd got up to date with our work, they took the Arab away. And then, thinking he wouldn't inform since he'd robbed us of so much money, we went into the bush to find the piles that had been accepted, so as to go on with the same manoeuvre. One day the Arab followed us very close, but hidden, to see if we really were stealing wood. Then he came out into the open. "Ha, ha! You still steal 'em wood and no pay! If you no give five hundred francs, me inform."

'Thinking it was only a threat, we refused. The next day he was back again. "You pay, or you in black-hole tonight." We refused again. In the afternoon he came back with the screws. It was horrible, Papillon! When they'd stripped us, they took us to the heaps where we'd taken wood, and with these savages behind us and the Arab flogging us with his pizzle, they forced us to undo our heaps at the double and make up each one we had stolen from. This corrida lasted two days, with nothing to eat or drink. Often we fell down. The Arab got us up with a kick or with his whip. Finally we just lay there on the ground - we couldn't go on. Do you know how he made us get up? He took one of those sort of wasps' nests, the kind the red stingers live in. He cut the branch the nest was hanging from and crushed it down on us. The pain was so terrible we not only got up, but we tore around as if we were mad. There's just no telling you how agonizing it was. You know how a wasp sting hurts? Well, imagine fifty or sixty of them. Those red stingers sting far, far worse than wasps.

'We were still in the black-hole for ten days on bread and water, and they never treated us at all. Even though we rubbed urine on the stings, they burnt terribly for three days on end. I lost my left eye – a dozen had attacked it all together. When we were sent back to the camp, the other prisoners decided to help us. They each gave us a bit of hard-wood cut to the same size. That provided us with close on a yard, and it helped us a very great deal, because then we only had about one yard to cut between us. It was hard, but we just managed it. Little by little our strength came back. We ate a great deal. And it was just by chance that we had the notion of using the ants for our revenge against the Arab. We were looking for hard-wood and we came across a huge nest of flesh-eating ants in a thicket – they were actually eating a deer the size of a goat.

'The Arab was still making his rounds, inspecting the work, and one fine day we knocked him out with the handle of an axe and dragged him to the ants' nest. We stripped him and tied him to a tree, bent backwards on the ground, his hands and feet tied with the thick ropes we used for the logs. We made a few cuts here and there on his body with the axe. We stuffed his mouth with grass, held in by a gag, so he couldn't shout; and we waited. The ants didn't go for him till we'd stirred their nest with a stick and sprinkled them on to him. Then it didn't take long. Half an hour later there were thousands and thousands of ants at work. Have you seen flesh-eating ants, Papillon?'

'No, never. I've seen the big black ones.'

'These ones are tiny, and as red as blood. They tear out microscopic bits of flesh and carry them to their nest. We'd suffered from the wasps, all right; but just imagine what he must have gone through, flayed alive by these thousands of ants. He took two whole days and one morning to die. In twenty-four hours he had no eyes left.

'I admit we had no mercy in our revenge, but then you have to think what he did to us. It was a miracle we survived. Of course they looked for the Arab everywhere; and the other Arab turnkeys, as well as the screws, suspected we had something to do with his disappearance.

'In another thicket we made a hole for what was left of him, deepening it a little every day. They'd still not found any trace of him when a screw saw this hole was being dug. When we went off to work, he followed to see what was up. That was what finished us.

'One morning, as soon as we had reached our place, we untied the Arab: he was still covered with ants although he was almost a skeleton. And just as we were dragging him to the hole (you couldn't carry him without the ants biting till the blood came) three Arab turnkeys and two warders came out. They had been waiting patiently, well hidden, for us to do just that—to bury him.

'Well, there you are. Our official version is that we killed him first and then gave him to the ants. The prosecution, backed by the medical evidence, says there was no mortal wound—they say we had him eaten alive. Our defending screw [warders there will act as counsel] says we might save our heads if they believe what we say. Otherwise we're for it. To tell you the truth, we haven't much hope. That's why my friend and me chose you as our heir, without saying.'

'Let's hope I don't inherit from you: I say that in all sincerity.' We had a cigarette and I saw they were looking at me as much as to say, 'Well, aren't you going to say something?'

'Look, brothers, I can see you're waiting for what you asked to begin with—what I think of your case, judging it as a man. One last question—it won't have any influence on what I'm going to say. What do most of the men in this room think of it, and why don't you speak to anybody?'

'Most of them think we ought to have killed him, but not to have had him eaten alive. As for our keeping quiet, we don't talk to anyone because one day we had a chance of rioting and making a break, and they wouldn't take it.'

'Well, mates, I'll tell you how I see it. You did right to pay him back a hundred times over for what he did to you: the caper with the wasps or red stingers was something that can't be forgiven. If they do guillotine you, at the last moment think as hard as ever you can just this one thing, "They're cutting off my head: from the moment of tying me down and shoving me into the hole to the dropping of the knife, it'll last thirty seconds. His death agony lasted sixty hours. I come out the winner." As for the other men in the room, I don't know whether you're right: you might have thought a riot that day would have made a mass break possible; and the rest might have thought otherwise. Besides, in a rising like that, you might always have to kill someone without having meant it beforehand. Now of all the people in here, I believe the only ones whose heads are in danger are you two and the Graville brothers. Friends, it all necessarily depends on where you sit.'

The two poor souls were pleased with our talk: they went off, going back to the life of silence they had broken to speak to me.

The Cannibals' Break

'Where's the wooden leg? They ate it.' 'One portion of peg-leg stew, hot.' Or a voice pretending to be a woman's and calling out, 'Just a slice of well-grilled gent, chef, with no pepper, please.'

In the silent darkness of the night it was rare we didn't hear one of these shouts, if not all three. Clousiot and I wondered what they meant, and who they were meant for.

This afternoon I had the key of the mystery. It was one of the chief actors that told me about it, Marius from La Ciotat, a specialist in safe-breaking. When he learnt that I'd known his father, Titin, he wasn't afraid of talking to me.

When I'd told him part of my break, I naturally said to him, 'And what about you?'

'Oh, me,' he said, 'I'm in a hell of a jam. I'm very much afraid I may cop five years, just for an ordinary escape. I belonged to the one they called the cannibals' break. When you hear them call out "Where's the wooden leg, etc.?" and "One stew, etc.," in the night, that's meant for the Graville brothers.'

'Six of us left from Kilometre Forty-Two. In the break there were Dédé and Jean Graville, two brothers of thirty and thirty-five from Lyons; a Neapolitan from Marseilles and me from La Ciotat; and then a wooden-legged guy from Angers and a kid of twenty-three who acted as his wife. We got out of the Maroni well enough, but at sea we could never make our offing, and in a few hours we were forced back on to the shore of Dutch Guiana.'

'There was nothing we could save from the wreck, no food, no stores, nor anything else. So there we were again in the bush

- luckily we had our clothes. I ought to have said that in this part there's no beach at all and the sea comes right into the virgin forest. What with the fallen trees, broken off short at the bottom or undermined by the sea and all tangled with one another, it's impossible to get through.

'When we had walked for a whole day we reached dry land. We split into three groups, the Gravilles, Guesepi and me, and peg-leg and his boy-friend. To cut it short, we set off in different directions and then twelve days later the Gravilles, Marius and I met again almost at the place where we'd separated. It was surrounded with mud you sank down in and we hadn't found any way through. I don't have to tell you how browned off we were. We'd been living thirteen days with no grub apart from a few roots and the ends of twigs. We were dead-beat, dying of hunger - completely done. We decided that Marius and me should use what strength we had left to go back to the edge of the sea. There we should tie a shirt as high as we could in a tree and so give ourselves up to the first Dutch coast-guard boat - one would certainly be coming by. When the Gravilles had rested a few hours, they were supposed to try and find the track of the other two. It ought to be easy enough, because on setting out we'd agreed that each group should mark where it had gone with broken branches.

'But a few hours later, what did they see but peg-leg coming their way, all alone.

' "Where's the kid?"

' "I left him far behind: he couldn't walk any more."

' "You're a sod for having left him."

' "He was the one who wanted me to go back to where we'd started from."

'At that moment Dédé noticed that on his solitary foot he was wearing one of the kid's shoes. "And you left him bare-foot into the bargain, so you could put on his shoe? Congratulations! And you seem pretty fit: you aren't in the same state as us. Anyone can see you've had plenty to eat."

' "Yes, I found a big monkey that had been wounded."

' "How lucky for you." And with this Dédé got up, his knife in his hand. Seeing peg-leg's haversack full, he thought he knew what had happened. "Open your sack. What's it got inside?"

'He opened the bag and a piece of flesh appeared.

' "What's that?"

"A bit of monkey."

"You sod, you killed the boy to eat him!"

"No, Dédé, I swear I didn't. He was so worn out he died, and I only ate a little bit of him. Forgive me."

He hadn't time to finish before the knife was in his guts. And it was then, when they searched him, that they found a leather bag with matches and a striker. What with fury because peg-leg hadn't shared the matches before parting, and what with hunger – to cut it short, they lit a fire and started in on the type.

Guesepi arrived in the middle of the banquet. They asked him to join in. Guesepi wouldn't. On the shore he'd eaten crabs and raw fish. So without joining in he watched the Gravilles arranging other pieces of flesh on the embers and even making use of the wooden leg to keep up the fire. That day and the next, then, he watched the Gravilles eat the man; and he even noticed what pieces they ate – the skin, the thigh, and both buttocks.

'As for me,' went on Marius, 'I was still there by the sea when Guesepi came to fetch me. We filled a hat with little fishes and crabs and we went and cooked them at the Gravilles' fire. But I did see a good many pieces of meat left, lying on the ashes to one side of the fire.'

Three days later the coast-guards picked us up and handed us back to the authorities at Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. Guesepi couldn't keep quiet. Everyone in this room knows all about it, even the screws. And it's because everybody knows it that I'm telling you. And so – the Gravilles being bad characters – that's why you hear this nonsense in the night.

'We're officially accused of escape aggravated by cannibalism. The worst of it is, I can only defend myself by accusing others; and that's just not possible. Everybody, including Guesepi, denied everything at the inquiry. We said they'd vanished in the bush. So that's how I stand, Papillon.'

'I pity you, brother: for you can't defend yourself by blaming others, and that's a fact.'

A month later Guesepi was murdered, stabbed right in the heart by night. There was no sort of question who did it.

And that is the genuine story of the cannibals who ate the man, roasting him over his own wooden leg – the man who had himself eaten the kid who went along with him.

That night I lay farther along the iron bar. I took the lace of a man who had gone, and Clousiot, having asked everybody to move up one, was next to me now. From this place, even with my left foot shackled to the bar, I could sit up and watch what went on in the yard. The security was so tight there was no rhythm in the patrols. They came one after another continuously; and different patrols might appear from the other direction at any moment.

My feet were carrying me very well now, and they didn't hurt unless it rained. So I was all set up for fresh action: but what was to be done? This room had no windows, only a huge set of bars running in one sweep its whole length and going up to the roof. It was so placed that the north-east wind (but only the wind) could pass freely. I kept watch for a week, but even so I couldn't find the least opening in the warders' security. For the first time I was close to admitting that they might manage to shut me up in the solitary-confinement prison on the Ile Saint-Joseph. I was told it was horrible: they called it the man-eater. Another piece of information – in the eighty years it had been in existence, not a single man had ever managed to escape from it.

Of course this half-acceptance of having lost the game forced me to look towards the future. I was twenty-eight and the prosecuting captain was going to ask for five years of solitary. It would be hard to get off with less. So I'd be thirty-three when I came out.

I still had plenty of money in my charger. So if I couldn't escape, which, from what I knew, seemed likely, at least I should have to keep myself fit. It's hard to take five years solitary without going mad. So I should have to eat well, and from the first day of my sentence discipline my mind according to a carefully laid down and varied programme. Avoid day-dreaming about castles in Spain as much as possible; and even more day-dreaming about revenge. So from now on I prepare myself for the terrible punishment ahead, and come through a winner. Yes, their malice would get them nowhere. I'd come out of solitary physically strong and still in full possession of my bodily and mental powers.

It did me good to lay down this plan of conduct and to accept what was coming to me with a calm mind. The gentle wind that made its way into the room reached me before anybody else, and it was really soothing.

Clousiot knew when I didn't want to talk. So he didn't disturb my silence: he just smoked a great deal, that's all. There were a few stars showing. I said to him, 'Can you see the stars from where you are?'

'Yes,' he said, leaning over a little. 'But I'd rather not look at them; they remind me too much of the stars during our break.'

'Don't worry - we'll see thousands more in our next one.'

'When? In five years time?'

'Clousiot, don't you think the year we've just lived through and all the adventures we've had and all the people we've known are worth five years solitary? Would you rather have been on the islands from the beginning and not have gone on this break? What's waiting for us is not all jam; but does it make you regret you ever came on the break? Tell me straight, do you regret it, yes or no?'

'Papi, you're forgetting one thing I didn't have - the seven months you spent with the Indians. If I'd been with you, I'd think the same: but I was in prison.'

'Forgive me. I'd forgotten - I'm wandering in my mind.'

'No, you're not wandering at all; and in spite of everything I'm glad we made our break, because I had some unforgettable moments too. Only I do feel rather anxious about what's waiting for me in the man-eater. Five years - it's next to impossible to come through.'

Then I told him just what I'd determined to do and I felt him respond very positively. It made me happy, seeing my friend's morale coming right back. In a fortnight's time we were to come up before the court. According to certain rumours the major who was coming to preside over the court-martial was a hard man, but very just, it seemed. He wouldn't swallow the Administration's nonsense too easily. So the news was good rather than bad.

Maturette had been in a cell ever since we got back. But Clousiot and I refused to have a warder to act as counsel: we decided that I should speak for all three and that I should put forward our defence myself.

That morning, freshly shaved and clipped, dressed in new red-striped dungarees and wearing shoes, we were waiting in the yard until we should be called before the court. Clousiot had had his plaster off a fortnight before. He could walk normally; it had not left him with a limp.

The court-martial had begun on Monday. Now it was Saturday morning, and so there had been five days taken up with the various trials – the business of the fellows with the ants had taken up a whole day. They were both sentenced to death, and I never saw them again. The Graville brothers only copped four years (no proof of the act of cannibalism). Their trial lasted more than half a day. The other killings got four or five years. Looking at the fourteen defendants as a whole, the sentences were rather on the severe side, but reasonable – not exaggerated. The sittings began at half past seven. We were there when a major in the Camel Corps uniform came in, accompanied by an elderly infantry captain and a lieutenant – his two assessors.

To the right of the court a sergeant warder and a captain – the prosecutor representing the Administration.

‘Case of Charrière, Clousiot, Maturette.’

We were about four yards from the judges. I had time to look very attentively at the major: he was about forty or forty-five; the desert had lined his face, and the hair at his temples was silver. Thick eyebrows over splendid black eyes that looked straight into our faces. A genuine soldier. There was nothing wicked in his gaze. He looked searchingly at us and weighed us up in a few seconds. My eyes met his and then I lowered them of my own free will.

The Administration captain knocked us about altogether too hard and that was what lost him the game. He called the stunning of the warders attempted murder. He would have it that it was a miracle the Arab had not died under our repeated blows. He made another error when he said that we were the convicts who had carried France’s dishonour farthest afield since the penal settlement was founded. ‘As far as Colombia! Monsieur le Président, these men traversed one thousand five hundred miles and more. Trinidad, Curaçao and Colombia – all these countries will certainly have heard the vilest calumnies about the French penal administration. I ask for two consecutive sentences, that is to say a total of eight years – five for attempted manslaughter on the one hand, and on the other three for escaping. This applies to Charrière and Clousiot. As far as Maturette is concerned, I only ask three years for escaping; because at the inquiry it came out that he took no part in the attempted murder.'

The president: 'The court would like to hear the shortest possible account of this very long odyssey.'

Leaving out the Maroni part, I told them about our sea voyage as far as Trinidad. I described the Bowens and their kindness. I quoted the remark of the Trinidad chief of police, 'We are not here to pass judgment on the French legal system, but there's one thing we don't agree with, and that's the sending of criminals to French Guiana; which is the reason why we are helping you.' I told them about Curaçao, Father Irénée de Bruyne, the incident of the bag of florins, and then about Colombia – how and why we went there. Then, in very few words, a short account of my life with the Indians. The major listened without interrupting. He only asked for a few further details about my time with the Indians, which interested him immensely. Then I spoke of the Colombian prisons, especially the under-water black-hole at Santa Marta.

'Thank you: your account has enlightened and at the same time interested the court. Now there will be a break for fifteen minutes. I do not see your defending counsel; where are they?'

'We haven't got any. I'm going to ask your permission to put forward my friends' defence and my own.'

'You may do so: it is allowed by the regulations.'

'Thank you.'

A quarter of an hour later the sitting began again. The president: 'Charrière, the court allows you to put forward your friends' defence and your own. Nevertheless we warn you that the court will reduce you to silence if you speak disrespectfully to the representative of the Administration. You are quite free to defend yourself, but you must use proper language. You may begin.'

'I ask the court to simply ignore the accusation of attempted murder – to set it aside. It is completely unbelievable, and I'll show why: I was twenty-seven last year and Clousiot thirty;

we were just out from France and we were fit and strong. One of us is five foot seven and the other five foot eight. We hit the Arab and the warders with our iron bed-legs. Not one of the four was seriously hurt. We had not meant to harm them and we hit very carefully, just so as to knock them out, and that's exactly what we managed to do. The prosecuting warder forgot to mention – or perhaps he didn't know it – that the lengths of iron were wrapped in cloth so there'd be no danger of killing anyone. The court, made up of regular soldiers, is very well aware of what a strong man can do when he hits anyone on the head, even if it's only with the flat of a bayonet. So just imagine what could be done with an iron bed-leg. I'd like to point out to the court that not one of the four men who were attacked had to go to hospital.

'Seeing we've got life sentences, it seems to me that the crime of escaping is less serious than it would be for men with a short time to serve. At our age it's very hard to bear the thought of never going back into real life again. I ask the court's indulgence for all three of us.'

The major whispered with his two colleagues, then he tapped his desk with a mallet. 'Defendants, stand up.'

We stood there waiting, as stiff as ramrods.

The president: 'The court sets aside the accusations of attempted murder: it therefore has not to pronounce sentence, even of acquittal, upon that subject. You are found guilty of the crime of escaping, guilty in the second degree. For this crime, the court sentences you to two years of solitary confinement.'

Speaking all together, we said, 'Thank you, Major.' And I added, 'We thank the court.'

The screws who were listening to the trial at the back of the room were absolutely thunderstruck. When we went back to our companions, everybody was happy about the news – not the least jealousy. On the contrary. Even those who had copped it hard whole-heartedly congratulated us on our luck. François Sierra came and embraced me. He was wild with delight.

Sixth Exercise-Book
The Îles du Salut

Our Arrival at the Islands

The next day we were to take ship for the Îles du Salut. This time, in spite of all my struggles, here I was within not much more than a few hours of life internment. In the first place I'd have to do two years of solitary on the Île Saint-Joseph. The convicts called that prison the man-eater: I hoped I'd be able to prove the nickname false.

I'd lost the game; but my heart wasn't that of a loser.

I ought to be very happy at having only two years to do in this prison within a prison. As I'd sworn to myself, I shouldn't allow my mind to go wandering the way it so easily does in complete isolation. I had a remedy to keep me away from that. From this very moment I must consider myself as a free man, already free, healthy and well, like any other ordinary convict on the islands. I should be thirty when I came out.

I knew that escapes from the islands were very rare. They could be counted on your fingers; but even so, men had got away. Well, I'd get away too: that was for sure. In two years I'd escape from the islands: I repeated this to Clousiot, who was sitting there next to me.

'It's hard to get you down, Papillon, my old mate; and I wish I had your faith in being free one of these days. For a year now you've been making break after break, and you've never once given up. No sooner has one gone bad on you but you're preparing another. It astonishes me you've tried nothing here.'

'Here there's only one possible way of setting about it, mate, and that's starting a riot. But that means taking all these extremely difficult men in hand and I just haven't got the time that it needs. I very nearly started one, but I was afraid it'd get out of control. All the forty men in here are old lags. They've gone pretty well down the drain and they don't react the same as us. Look at the cannibals, for example, and the characters with the ants; and then the character who wanted to kill a man and didn't hesitate to put poison in the soup, finishing off seven others who'd never done him any harm.'

'But on the islands it's going to be the same kind of men.'

'Yes, but I'll escape from the islands without needing anybody's help. I'll make my break alone, or with one companion at the most. What are you smiling about, Clousiot?'

'I'm smiling because you never give up. You're on fire to be in Paris, handing the bill to your three friends there, and that keeps you going at such a pitch you just won't admit that what you long for may never happen.'

'Good-night, Clousiot. See you tomorrow. Yes, so we're going to have a look at these bleeding Iles du Salut after all. The first thing I'll ask is why they call that fag-end of hell the Islands of Salvation.' I turned my back on Clousiot and leant out a little more to the night-wind.

Very early the next day we embarked for the islands. Twenty-six men on board a four hundred-ton tub called the Tanon, a coaster that made the round trip Cayenne - the Islands - Saint-Laurent and back again. We were shackled two by two to a chain; and we were handcuffed as well. There were two groups of eight men each on the fo'c'sle, guarded by four screws holding rifles. Ten aft, with six screws and the two leaders of the escort. Everybody was on the deck of this old tramp: she was obviously longing to plunge to the bottom at the first hint of a heavy sea.

I'd made up my mind not to think during the crossing, and I looked round for some way of amusing myself. So speaking loud and clear to a glum-faced warder next to me, I said just by way of putting him out, 'What with all these chains you've loaded us with, we shan't have much chance of escaping if this staggering old wreck sinks, which seems very likely seeing her condition and how rough the sea is.'

The screw wasn't all that bright and he reacted just as I had foreseen. 'Whether you people drown or not is all one to us. We've had orders to chain you and that's all there is to it. The people who gave the orders are responsible. In any event we're covered.'

'Why, you're quite right, Monsieur le Surveillant, whichever way you look at it: because if this floating coffin falls apart at sea, we all go to the bottom, chains or no chains.'

'Oh, she's been doing this round for a long time now, you know,' said the half-wit, 'and nothing's ever happened to her.'

'Sure: but it's just for that reason – just because this boat's been going the round too long that she's ready to fall to pieces at any moment now.' I had succeeded in doing what I had set out to do – I'd stirred the general silence that was getting on my nerves. The warders and the convicts at once seized upon the subject. 'Yes, this old tub is dangerous: and on top of that, we're in chains. With no chains, at least we'd stand a chance.' 'Oh, that doesn't make any difference. With our uniform, boots and rifle, we're not so light, either.' 'The rifle doesn't count, because in case of shipwreck you can chuck it away at once,' said another.

Seeing the thing had caught on, I tossed off another remark. 'Where are the life-boats? I can only see one very small job, just big enough for eight at the outside. What with the captain and the crew, it would be crammed. As for everybody else – kiss my hand, farewell.'

Now it really got going, and the tone of the discussion rose. 'It's quite true, there's nothing at all; and this boat's in such a state – it's a wicked piece of irresponsibility to make family men run such a risk, escorting these scum.'

As I formed a part of the group aft, the two leaders of the convoy were near at hand. One of them looked at me and said, 'Are you the one they call Papillon? The man they brought back from Colombia?'

'Yes.'

'It doesn't surprise me you went so far: you look as though you understood the sea.'

Ostentatiously I replied, 'Yes, I do. Thoroughly.' That cast a damp, all right. What's more the captain was on deck: he'd come down from the bridge to take the wheel as we left the estuary of the Maroni, that being the most dangerous place, and now he'd handed it over to someone else. This captain, then – a very small, fat, coal-black Negro with quite a youthful face – asked which were the men who'd sailed as far as Colombia on a bit of driftwood.

'This one here, and him, and the other one over there,' said the head of the convoy.

'Which was the captain?' asked the dwarf.

'I was, Monsieur.'

'Well, shipmatè, as a sailor I congratulate you. You're no ordinary man. Here.' He put his hand in his jacket pocket.

'Take this tobacco and these cigarette papers. Smoke it and wish me good luck.'

'Thanks, Captain. But I must congratulate you too, for having the courage to sail in this death-trap: and to do so once or even twice a week, they tell me.'

He roared with laughter, terrifying the people I had wanted to upset. 'Oh, you're right,' he said. 'This tub ought to have been sent to the breaker's yard years and years ago, but the company's waiting for it to sink so as to get the insurance.'

Then I ended up with a splendid stroke. 'Luckily there's a life boat for you and the crew.'

'Yes, isn't it lucky?' said the captain without thinking as he went down the ladder.

I'd started this subject of conversation on purpose, and it filled more than four hours of my journey. Everyone had his bit to say, and somehow – I don't know how – the argument spread as far as the fo'c'sle.

Towards ten o'clock that morning there wasn't much of a sea, but the wind was unfavourable. We steered north-east, that is to say against the sea and against the breeze; so of course we rolled and pitched more than usual. Many warders and convicts were seasick. Fortunately the one chained to me had his sea-legs, because there's nothing so unpleasant as seeing someone throw up right next to you. This character was a genuine Parisian titi – a tough, a wide-boy. He'd come to Guiana in 1927. So it was seven years now that he'd been on the islands. He was comparatively young – thirty-eight. 'They call me Titi la Belote, because I must admit I'm a wonderful player of belote. In any case, that's what I make my living at, on the islands. Belote all night long at two francs the point. If you bid, you can go a long way. If you win with the jack at two hundred, the type pays out four hundred francs plus the small charge for the other points.'

'But do you mean there's that kind of money on the islands?'

'Why, of course there is, my poor Papillon! The islands are full of chargers stuffed with cash. Some come across with them: others get it in through bent warders, paying fifty per cent. Anyone can tell you're green, mate. You sound as though you didn't know the first thing about it.'

'No, I know absolutely nothing about the islands. All I know is it's very hard to escape from them.'

'Escape?' said Titi. 'It's not even worth wasting your breath, talking about it. I've been on the islands seven years now, and in that time there've been two breaks. And how did they end up? Three dead and two retaken: that's how they ended up, brother. Nobody's succeeded. That's the reason why there aren't many who want to have a go.'

'Why did you go to the mainland?'

'To be X-rayed to see if I had an ulcer or not.'

'And you didn't try to escape from the hospital?'

'You're dead right I didn't try to escape from the hospital! You're the one who mucked all that up, Papillon. And on top of that, it was just my luck to be shoved into the very ward you escaped from. So just try and imagine the security, will you? Every time you went anywhere near a window to get a breath of air, they made you stand back. And when you asked why they said, "It's in case you might have the idea of carrying on like Papillon."'

'Tell me, Titi, who's the big guy sitting next to the convoy leader? An informer?'

'Are you crazy? That guy, everybody thinks the world of him. He's a square, but he knows how to behave like a genuine crook - no matinees with the warders, no privileges accepted. Knows his place as a convict and keeps to it properly. Can give you sound advice: a good sidekick: cold and distant with the cops. Not even the priest or the doctor can get him to work for them. And this square who behaves like a right tough guy, as you see, is a descendant of Louis XV. He's a count, the genuine article: his name's Comte Jean de Bérac. But still, when he first came it took a very long while for the men to come to think anything of him, on account of what sent him to penal was a very dirty, messy job indeed.'

'What did he do?'

'Well, he went and tossed his own baby off a bridge into a stream, and as the kid fell in where it was very shallow, he found it in his heart to go down and chuck it into a deeper place.'

'Really? It's as though he went and killed his own kid twice over.'

'According to a friend of mine who's a clerk and who's seen his file, this character was terrorized by all his grand people. The girl who had had the baby was a servant in the big house, and the character's mother flung her out like a dog. According to my friend, this young fellow was under his proud old shrew of a mother's thumb, and she'd so ground him down because he, a count, had had an affair with a servant-girl, that when he tossed the kid into the water, having told the girl he was taking it to the Public Assistance, he didn't know which way up he was.'

'What did he get?'

'Only ten years. You must realize, Papillon, he's not an ordinary type like us. The countess, the guardian of the family's honour, must have made the judges understand that killing a servant's baby wasn't such a very serious crime when it was committed by a count – a guy that only wanted to preserve the glory of his house.'

'Moral?'

'Well, as I see it – but I'm just a humble Parisian wide-boy – as I see it, the moral is this: by and large, this Comte Jean de Bérac was a gent who'd been brought up in such a way that nothing counted except blue blood: – everything else was unimportant, just not worth bothering about. Maybe they weren't serfs in the full meaning of the word, but at all events they were people who didn't amount to anything at all. His mother, that monster of pomp and selfishness, had so put him through the mangle that he was like the rest of them – he thought he had the hereditary right to any of the girls in the neighbourhood. It was only in penal that he became a real noble in the right sense of the word. It may sound crazy, but it's only now that he's the genuine Comte Jean de Bérac.'

The Iles du Salut, that unknown quantity for me, were not going to remain unknown for more than a few hours now. What I did know was that it was very hard to escape. But not impossible. And as I drew in delightful breaths of the sea wind I said to myself, 'When will this head-wind be turned into a full following breeze for an escape?'

We were coming in. Here were the islands! They made a triangle with Royale and Saint-Joseph forming the base and Devil's Island the apex. The sun was already low in the sky, and it lit them up with that extreme brilliance you only see in the tropics. So we had plenty of time to make out all the details. To begin with there was Royale, with a flat ledge running right round a hill about seven hundred feet high. The very top was flat too. The whole thing looked just like a Mexican hat set down on the sea, with its top cut off. Very tall coconut palms everywhere: very green, too. The little red-roofed houses made the island look particularly attractive, and anyone who didn't know what was on shore might have wanted to spend his life there. There was a lighthouse on the plateau, and no doubt they lit it up at night in bad weather, so that ships shouldn't run on the rocks. Now that we were close in I could make out five long buildings. Titi told me the first two were huge barracks with four hundred convicts living in them. Then the disciplinary block, with its punishment cells, all surrounded by a high white wall. The fourth building was the hospital and the fifth housed the warders. And scattered all over the slopes there were these little red-roofed houses where other warders lived. Farther away, but quite close to the tip of Royale, there was Saint-Joseph. Fewer palms, less foliage: and then, right up on top of the plateau, a huge construction that could be seen quite clearly from the sea. I knew what it was at once — the solitary-confinement prison. Titi la Belote confirmed this. He pointed out the barracks of the camp where the prisoners doing ordinary sentences lived. They were lower down, near the sea. You could see the watch-towers and their crenellations standing out quite clearly. And then there were other pretty little houses, with their white walls and red roofs.

As the ship was going into Royale by the southern channel we could now no longer see Devil's Island. In the glimpse I had had of it earlier, it had looked like one enormous palm-covered rock, with no considerable buildings on it. A few yellow houses along the edge of the sea, with black roofs. I learnt later that these were the houses where the political prisoners lived.

We were running into the harbour of Royale, well sheltered behind an immense breakwater made of huge blocks. A work that must have cost a good many convicts their lives in the building.

Three hoots on the siren, and the Tanon dropped anchor about two hundred and fifty yards from the quay. This very long jetty, well built of rounded stones and cement, rose about ten feet from sea-level. White-painted buildings ran parallel with it, some way back. I read Guard-Room, Boat Office, Bakery and Harbour-Master's Office painted in black on the white background.

I could see convicts staring at the boat. They were not dressed in the striped uniform: they were all wearing trousers and a kind of white jacket. Titi la Belote told me that on the islands the men with money had comfortable and even quite decent-looking uniforms made to measure by the tailors, who used flour sacks with the lettering removed. He said almost no one wore convict's clothes.

A boat came towards the Tanon. One warder at the tiller, two warders with rifles to the right and the left of him: close to the steersman, aft, six convicts. They stood there, bare to the waist, in white trousers, and they rowed along, plying huge oars. They covered the distance in no time. Behind they towed a large craft rather like a ship's lifeboat; it was empty. They came alongside. First the leaders of the convoy got into the stern. Then two armed warders moved into the bows. Our legs were unchained but our handcuffs were left on, and two by two we went down into the boat, first the ten in my group and then eight from the fo'c'sle. The rowers gave way. They'd make another trip for the rest. We got out at the quay, and there, lined up in front of the harbour-master's office, we waited. None of us had any baggage. The transportees, taking no notice of the screws, talked to us openly, at a prudent distance of five or six yards. Several of the men who had been in my convoy called out friendly greetings to me. Cesari and Essari, two Corsican strong-arm men I'd known at Saint-Martin, told me they were boatmen, working in the harbour. At this point there appeared Chapar, of the Marseilles stock-exchange business, whom I'd known in Paris, quite apart from prison. Without taking any notice at all of the screws he called out, 'Don't you worry, Papillon! You can count on your friends - you'll lack for nothing in solitary. What did you get?'

'Two years.'

'Fine: that's soon over. Then you'll come in with us, and you'll see life's not too bad here.'

'Thanks, Chapar. How's Dega?'

'He's a clerk up there. I'm surprised he hasn't come. He'll be sorry not to have seen you.'

Now here was Galgani. He came towards me, and when the guard tried to stop him he pushed past, saying, 'You're not going to stop me embracing my own brother, are you? What the bloody hell?' And as he embraced me he said, 'You can count on me.'

He was about to go when I said, 'What are you doing?'

'I'm a postman - I look after the letters.'

'You OK?'

'It's a quiet life.'

The remaining men had been brought ashore and now they joined us. We were all unhandcuffed. Titi la Belote, de Bérac and some men I didn't know moved away from the group. A war-ter said to them, 'Come on: up to the camp.' All of them had their kitbags with the prison outfit: each swung his bag on to his shoulder, and they set off for a road that must lead to the top of the island. The governor of the islands appeared, accompanied by six warders. There was a roll-call. We were all there, and he took delivery of us. The escort withdrew.

'Where's the clerk?' asked the governor.

'He's coming, sir.'

I saw Dega appear, in good white clothes and a buttoned jacket; and with him there came a warder. Each had a big book under his arm, they brought the men out of the ranks one by one, giving each his new number. 'You, prisoner So-and-so, transportee number x, you'll now be confinee number z.'

'What sentence?'

'X years.'

When it came to my turn, Dega embraced me again and again. The governor came over. 'Is this Papillon?'

'Yes, sir,' said Dega.

'Take care of yourself in solitary. Two years soon pass.'

Solitary Confinement

A boat was ready. Out of the nineteen for solitary, ten were going in this first one. My name was called. Calmly Dega said, 'No. This man's going on the last trip.'

Ever since I'd arrived I'd been astonished at the way the convicts spoke. There was no feeling of discipline and they looked as though they didn't give a damn for the screws. Dega came and stood next to me, and we talked. He already knew all about me and about my break. Men who had been with me at Saint-Laurent had come to the islands and had told him everything. He was too delicate to say he was sorry for me. He said just one thing, but very sincerely – ‘You deserved to bring it off, boy. It’ll be for the next time.’ He didn’t even tell me to keep my heart up: he knew there was no need.

‘I’m the chief accountant and I’m in with the governor. Look after yourself in solitary. I’ll send you in tobacco and enough to eat. You won’t go short of anything.’

‘Papillon, on your way!’

It was my turn. ‘Be seeing you all. Thanks for everything.’

And I stepped into the boat. Twenty minutes later we came alongside at Saint-Joseph. I had time to notice that there were only three armed warders aboard for the six convict-boatmen who were rowing and the ten men on their way to solitary. Working out the taking of this boat would have been a piece of cake. Welcoming committee at Saint-Joseph. Two governors introduced themselves to us – the governor of the island’s ordinary prison establishment and the governor of the Réclusion – the solitary-confinement prison. With an escort, we were marched up the road leading to solitary. Not a single convict on our path. As we went in through the big iron gates with the words Reclusion Disciplinaire over them I at once grasped just how grimly efficient this prison was. Behind the iron gate and the four high walls there was a little building with the words Administrative Block on it, and three other larger ones labelled A, B and C. We were taken into the administration block. A cold great room. The nineteen of us lined up in two ranks. The governor of the Réclusion said to us, ‘Prisoners, as you know, this establishment is a place for the punishment of crimes committed by men who have already been sentenced to penal servitude and transportation. Here we don’t try to make you mend your ways. We know it’s useless. But we do try to bring you to heel. There’s just one rule here – keep your mouth shut. Total silence. It’s dangerous to telephone: if you’re caught, a very severe punishment. If you’re not seriously ill, don’t go sick. Because if you do, and you’re found to be swinging the lead, that’s another punishment. That’s all I have to say to you. Oh, and by the way, smoking is strictly forbidden. Right, warders: search them thoroughly and put each into his cell. Charrière, Clousiot and Maturette are not to be in the same building. See to it yourself, Monsieur Santori.'

Ten minutes later I was shut up in cell 234 in block A. Clou-siot was in B and Maturette in C. We said good-bye with a silent look. The moment we came in, we had all grasped that if we wanted to come out alive we should have to obey these inhuman rules. I saw my companions go, companions of this long, long break, proud, brave comrades who'd gone along with me so courageously, never complaining, never regretting what we had done together. There was a lump in my throat, for these fourteen months of fighting side by side for our liberty had bound us together in a friendship that had no limits.

I looked closely at the cell they had put me into. I should never have imagined or believed that a country like mine, a country like France, the mother of freedom throughout the world, a country that had brought forth the Rights of Man and of the citizen, could possibly possess an establishment of such barbarous repression as the Saint-Joseph solitary-confinement prison – not even in French Guiana, not even in a pocket-handkerchief-sized island lost in the Atlantic. Imagine a hundred and fifty cells in a line, each one backing on to another, and each with no opening whatever in its four thick walls except a small iron door with a little trap in it. Painted on the door over each trap It is forbidden to open this door without administrative order. To the left there was a sleeping-plank with a wooden pillow – the same system as at Beaulieu – the plank was on hinges and it hooked up against the wall. One blanket; a block of cement in the far corner, to sit on; a brush; an army mug; a wooden spoon; an upright iron plate concealing a metal chamber-pot that was fixed to it by a chain. (It could be moved outwards into the corridor for emptying and inwards, into the cell, when you wanted to use it.) The cell was ten feet high. By way of a ceiling, huge iron bars as thick as tram-rails running criss-cross so that nothing of any size could come through. Then higher still the real roof of the building, perhaps twenty feet above the ground. A sentry-walk, about a yard wide, with an iron hand-rail, ran high over the back-to-back cells. Two warders continuously paced half the length of this walk, meeting in the middle and turning about. The impression was hideous. A fair amount of daylight came in as far as the sentry-walk. But even at midday you could hardly see at all right down in the cell. Straight away I began walking, waiting for them to blow the whistle or whatever they did to say the plank could be let down. So that there shouldn't be the slightest sound, both prisoners and warders were in soft slippers. At once there came to me the thought, 'Here, in cell 234, Charrière, nicknamed Papillon, is going to try and live through a sentence of two years, or seven hundred and thirty days, without going mad. It's up to him to show that this prison's name of man-eater is not entirely true.'

One, two, three, four, five, about-turn. One, two, three, four, five, about-turn. The screw's just gone by over my roof. I didn't hear him come – just saw him. Clack! The light was on: but it was very high up, hanging from the upper roof, twenty feet above. The sentry-walk was lit up, but the cells were in the twilight. I walked: the pendulum was swinging once more. Sleep in peace, you bastards of jurymen who sent me down, sleep in peace: because I believe that if you knew what you'd sent me to, you'd refuse to be party to the infliction of such a punishment – refuse with horror. It's going to be very hard to stop my imagination wandering. Almost impossible. The best thing to do is to direct it towards ideas that aren't too discouraging – better that than trying to suppress it altogether.

Yes, it was in fact a whistle that said it was time to lower the plank. I heard a loud voice saying, 'New men, this is to tell you that from now on you can lower your beds and lie down if you want to.' The only part I took notice of was 'if you want to'. So I went on walking: this was too grave a time for sleep. I'd have to get used to this cage open at the top. One, two, three, four, five: I'd got the pendulum rhythm right away: head down, hands behind my back, steps exactly the right length – to and fro like a pendulum, as though I were walking in my sleep. At the end of the five paces I didn't even see the wall, I just brushed against it in this tireless marathon that had neither finishing-post nor any given time in which it had to be run.

Yes, Papi, this man-eater is no sort of a joke: no sort of joke at all. And the shadow of the screw on the wall has a pretty quaint effect, too. If you looked up, raising your head, it was even more discouraging: you were like a leopard in a pit, watched from above by the hunter who'd just caught it. It was a horrible feeling; and it took months before I could get used to it.

Three hundred and sixty-five days in each year: seven hundred and thirty in two, unless there was a leap-year. I smiled at the notion. Seven hundred and thirty or seven hundred and thirty-one, it's all one, you know. What do you mean, it's all one? It's not the same thing at all. One day more is twenty-four hours more. And twenty-four hours, that's a long time. Seven hundred and thirty days of twenty-four hours each is a good deal longer. How many hours would that make? Could I work it out in my head? How could I tackle such a sum? Impossible. But why not? It can be done all right. Let's have a bash. A hundred days, that makes two thousand four hundred hours. Multiplying by seven is easy; it gives sixteen thousand eight hundred to begin with plus the remaining thirty days at twenty-four hours apiece; which gives seven hundred and twenty. Sixteen thousand eight hundred plus seven hundred and twenty, if I'm not mistaken, ought to give an answer of seventeen thousand five hundred and twenty hours. My dear Monsieur Papillon, you've got seventeen thousand five hundred and twenty hours to kill in this cage — a cage carefully designed for wild beasts, with its smooth walls. How many minutes have I got to spend here? That's of no consequence: hours, fair enough: but minutes, no. Let's not exaggerate. If minutes, why not seconds? But whether they signify or not, it's not that I'm interested in. What I really have to do is to fill these days, hours, minutes by myself, out of myself! Who can there be to the right of me? And to the left? And behind? If these three cells are filled those three men must also be wondering who's just arrived in 234.

There was the plop of something falling behind me, inside my cell. What could it be? Had my neighbour been skilful enough to toss something in through the bars? I tried to make out what it was. I could just distinguish something long and thin. — I sensed it rather than saw it. Just as I was about to pick it up it moved and began to hurry towards the wall. At its first movement I recoiled. When it reached the wall it climbed a little way up and then fell back to the ground. The surface was too smooth for it to get a footing. I let it try to make its way up the wall three times and then the fourth time, as it fell, I squashed it with my foot. It was soft under my slipper. What could it be? Going down on my knees I looked as close as I could and at last I made it out — it was a huge centipede, a good nine inches long and two fingers thick. I was filled with walking, waiting for them to blow the whistle or whatever they did to say the plank could be let down. So that there shouldn't be the slightest sound, both prisoners and warders were in soft slippers. At once there came to me the thought, 'Here, in cell 234, Charrière, nicknamed Papillon, is going to try and live through a sentence of two years, or seven hundred and thirty days, without going mad. Seven hundred and thirty or seven hundred and thirty-one, it's all one, you know. What do you mean, it's all one? It's not the same thing at all. One day more is twenty-four hours more. And twenty-four hours, that's a long time. Seven hundred and thirty days of twenty-four hours each is a good deal longer. How many hours would that make? Could I work it out in my head? How could I tackle such a sum? Impossible. But why not? It can be done all right. Let's have a bash. A hundred days, that makes two thousand four hundred hours. Multiplying by seven is easy; it gives sixteen thousand eight hundred to begin with plus the remaining thirty days at twenty-four hours apiece; which gives seven hundred and twenty. Sixteen thousand eight hundred plus seven hundred and twenty, if I'm not mistaken, ought to give an answer of seventeen thousand five hundred and twenty hours. My dear Monsieur Papillon, you've got seventeen thousand five hundred and twenty hours to kill in this cage - a cage carefully designed for wild beasts, with its smooth walls. How many minutes have I got to spend here? That's of no consequence: hours, fair enough: but minutes, no. Let's not exaggerate. If minutes, why not seconds? But whether they signify or not, it's not that I'm interested in. What I really have to do is to fill these days, hours, minutes by myself, out of myself! Who can there be to the right of me? And to the left? And behind? If these three cells are filled those three men must also be wondering who's just arrived in 234.

There was the plop of something falling behind me, inside my cell. What could it be? Had my neighbour been skilful enough to toss something in through the bars? I tried to make out what it was. I could just distinguish something long and thin - I sensed it rather than saw it. Just as I was about to pick it up it moved and began to hurry towards the wall. At its first movement I recoiled. When it reached the wall it climbed a little way up and then fell back to the ground. The surface was too smooth for it to get a footing. I let it try to make its way up the wall three times and then the fourth time, as it fell, I squashed it with my foot. It was soft under my slipper. What could it be? Going down on my knees I looked as close as I could and at last I made it out - it was a huge centipede, a good nine inches long and two fingers thick. I was filled with such disgust that I could not pick it up and put it in the chamber-pot. I kicked it under the bed. I'd look at it tomorrow, by daylight. As it happened I had plenty of time to see centipedes: they used to fall from the main roof high above. I learnt to let them walk about on my naked body, without catching hold of them or disturbing them as I lay there. I also had occasion to find out just how much a tactical error could cost in the way of pain. A sting from one of these revolting creatures could give you a raging fever for more than twelve hours, and it burnt terribly for close on six.

However, it was an amusement, too - something to divert my thoughts. When a centipede fell into my cell and I was awake, I would torture it as long as possible with the brush; or else I'd play with it, letting it hide and then trying to find it a few moments later.

One, two, three, four, five ... Dead silence everywhere. Was there nobody here who snored? Nobody who coughed? The heat was stifling, true enough. And this was night-time! What was it going to be like during the day? I was fated to live with centipedes. When the tide rose in the under-water black-hole of Santa Marta, great numbers of them used to come in: they were smaller, but they were of the same family as these. At Santa Marta, to be sure, there was the daily flooding; but we could talk and call out, we could listen to the others singing or the lunatics (temporary or permanent) shouting and raving. It wasn't the same thing at all. If I had the choice, I'd take Santa Marta. What you're saying now doesn't make sense, Papillon. At Santa Marta everyone agreed that the very most any man could stand was six months. Whereas here there are plenty who have four or five years to do, or even more. Sentencing them to do it is one thing: but the actual doing of it is something else again. How many kill themselves? I don't see how they could manage it. But it is possible, though. It wouldn't be easy, but you could just hang yourself. You make a rope with your trousers. You tie one end to the brush, stand on the sleeping-plank and push the rope round a bar. If you do it right up against the sentry-walk, it's probable the screw won't notice the rope. And just when he's gone by, you launch yourself into the empty air. By the time he comes back, you've already had it. In any case, he'd be in no hurry to come and open your cell to cut you down. Open the cell? He couldn't. On the door it's written

It is forbidden to open this door without administrative order. So don't you worry: the man who wants to commit suicide will have plenty of time before they unhook him 'by administrative order'.

All this I am writing about is perhaps neither very exciting nor very interesting for people who like action and movement. They can skip these pages if they find them dull. Yet it seems to me I ought to record these first impressions, these reactions during the first hours I was laid in the grave and these first thoughts that came flooding in upon me as I came into contact with my new cell – it seems to me I ought to describe them as exactly as I can.

I had been walking for a very long time now. I could hear a murmur in the darkness – the guards changing. The first had been a big, thin fellow: this one was small and fat. He dragged his slippers. You could hear them scuffing along two cells before and two cells after. He wasn't a hundred per cent silent like his mate. I went on walking. It must be late. What time could it be? Tomorrow I should have something to measure the time by. The trap in the door would open four times every day, and thanks to that I'd know roughly what o'clock it was. And at night, knowing the time the first patrol came on and how long it lasted, I'd have a fixed standard to live with – first, second, third patrol, etc.

One, two, three, four, five ... Mechanically I returned to this endless walk, and with tiredness helping, I took off easily and travelled back into the past. It must certainly have been by way of contrast to the darkness of my cell, but there I was in the full sunlight, sitting on the beach belonging to my tribe. The canoe with Lali fishing in it rose and fell on that matchless opal-green sea, two hundred yards away. The sand was rough under my feet. Zoraïma brought me a good-sized fish, cooked over the embers and carefully kept hot in a banana leaf. I ate with my fingers, of course, and she sat there cross-legged opposite me. She was very pleased with the way the flakes came away from the bone; and my face showed her how delighted I was with her dish.

I was no longer in my cell. I did not yet know anything about the Réclusion, nor Saint-Joseph, nor the islands. I rolled on the beach, cleaning my hands by rubbing them in the coral sand, as fine as flour. Then I went down to the sea to rinse my mouth in that brilliantly clear and salty water. I scooped it up and splashed my face. As I rubbed it on my neck I noticed how long my hair had grown. When Lali came back I'd ask her to shave the back of my neck. I spent all that night with my tribe. I undid Zoraïma's loin-cloth, and there on the beach, under the hot sun, with the sea breeze wafting over us, I had her. She uttered amorous groans, as she did when she was taking delight in it. Perhaps it was the wind that carried this music as far as Lali. In any case she saw us clearly enough, and she knew quite well we were fast together - she was too near not to be sure we were making love. She must certainly have seen us, for the boat came back to the land. Smiling, she jumped out. On the way she had undone her plaits and combed out her wet hair with her long fingers - the wind and the sun of that wonderful day were already drying it. I went over to her. She put her right arm round my waist and urged me up the beach in the direction of our hut. All the way she kept making me understand - 'Me too, me too'. When we were indoors she pushed me on to a hammock folded on the ground by way of a blanket; and interlaced with her I forgot the existence of the world. Zoraïma was very bright, and she took care not to come back until our play was over. When she appeared we were still lying there naked on the hammock, destroyed with love. She came and sat next to us, patting her sister's cheek and repeating a word that must certainly have meant something like greedy Lali. Then, with movements full of modest affection, she fixed my loin-cloth and then her sister's. I spent the whole of that night with the Goajiras. I didn't sleep at any time whatsoever. I did not even lie down so that behind my closed eyelids I might see the scenes I had lived through. It was during this continual pacing up and down in a kind of hypnosis that I was taken back, without any effort on my part, and set down once more in that extraordinarily beautiful day I had experienced nearly six months before.

The light went out and I could see that daybreak was flooding into the twilight of my cell, dispelling the kind of drifting dimness that enveloped everything below, everything around me. A blast on a whistle. I heard the planks banging up and I even distinguished the sound of my right-hand neighbour fastening his with the ring fixed in the wall. My neighbour coughed, and I heard the splash of water. How did you wash here?

'Monsieur le Surveillant, how do you wash here?'

'Confinee, I forgive you for not knowing, but here you're not allowed to speak to a warder on duty without being severely punished. To wash, you stand over the pot and pour from the jug with one hand. You wash yourself with the other. Haven't you unfolded your blanket?'

'No.'

'There'll certainly be a canvas towel inside it.'

Can you just imagine that? So you aren't allowed to speak to the warder on duty. Not for any reason at all? And what about if you're in too much pain from some illness? What if you're dying? Heart disease, appendicitis, a mortal go of asthma? Are you forbidden to call for help here, even though you're dying? That crowns everything! No: not really. It's quite natural. It would be too easy to kick up a row when you reach the end of your tether and your nerves give way. Just to hear voices, just to be spoken to, even if you were only to hear 'Die then; but shut up.' Twenty times a day a score out of the two hundred and fifty characters there might be here would start something so as to get rid of the gas building up its pressure inside their heads – get rid of it through a safety-valve, as it were.

It couldn't have been a psychiatrist who had the notion of building these lion cages: no doctor would lower himself so far. It wasn't a doctor who worked out the rules, either. But both the architect and the civil servant who did create this establishment, the two who laid down the smallest details of the carrying out of the sentences, were both of them revolting monsters, vicious, evil psychologists full of sadistical hatred for the convicts.

The black-hole of the central prison at Beaulieu, near Caen, might be very deep – two storeys beneath the ground – but even so, some echo of the tortures and ill-treatment handed out to a prisoner might in time make its way up to the rest of the world. That's proved by the fact that when they took off my handcuffs and thumb-pieces I really saw fear on the warders' faces – fear they might get into trouble, of that there is no doubt.

But here, in the settlement's solitary-confinement prison, where only people belonging to the service could come in, they were perfectly easy in their minds. Nothing could ever happen to them.

Clack, clack, clack, clack: all the traps were being opened. I went to mine, took the risk of peeping out, then leant through a little, and then pushed my whole head through into the corridor: To the left and right I saw a crowd of heads. Straight away I grasped that the moment the hatches were opened everyone darted his head out. The man on my right looked at me with absolutely no expression whatsoever. His brain numbed with masturbation, no doubt. His poor dim idiot face was pale and greasy. The one on the left quickly said, 'How long?'

'Two years.'

'I got four. Served one. What's your name?'

'Papillon.'

'I'm Georges. Jojo l'Anvergnet. Where were you copped?'

'Paris. And you?'

He had no time to answer. The coffee, with the hunk of bread coming after it, was only two cells away. He pulled in his head, and I did the same. I held out my mug, which was filled with coffee; then they gave me a piece of bread. As I didn't take it quick enough the hatch came down and my bread fell to the ground. In less than a quarter of an hour the silence had returned. There must be two separate distributions - a party for each corridor. Otherwise it was too quick. At noon, soup with a bit of boiled meat in it. In the evening, a dish of lentils. During two years this bill of fare never changed except at night, when it might be lentils, red beans, split peas, chick-peas, haricots or fried rice. Midday was always the same.

And then every fortnight you put your head out through the hatch and a convict took off your beard with fine barber's clippers.

Now I had been there three days. There was one thing that preyed on my mind. On Royale my friends had said they'd send me in things to smoke and eat. I'd still had nothing and in any case I wondered how they'd ever manage to bring off a miracle like that. So I was not absolutely amazed at having received nothing. Smoking must be very dangerous; and anyhow it was a luxury. Food, yes, that was going to be of the first importance, because the midday soup was just hot water with two or three bits of greenery in it and a little scrap of boiled meat - three or four ounces, maybe. In the evening it was a ladle of water with a few haricots or other dried vegetables floating about in it. To speak plainly, I didn't so much suspect the administration of not giving us proper rations as the other prisoners, who handed out the food or prepared it. This idea came to me because it was a little guy from Marseilles who dealt out the vegetables in the evening. His ladle went right down to the bottom of the pail, and when he was on duty I had more vegetables than water. With the rest it was the other way about: they didn't push the ladle far in but skimmed the top, having stirred a little. So what did you get? Plenty of wet, precious few vegetables. This underfeeding was very dangerous. To have willpower you need a certain bodily strength too.

The corridor was being swept: it seemed to me the broom kept going a long while outside my cell. The bristles swished again and again against my door. I looked closely and I saw a scrap of white paper showing underneath. I instantly understood that something was being slipped through for me, but it couldn't be pushed farther. He was waiting for me to pull it out before going on to sweep somewhere else. I pulled the paper in and unfolded it. It was a note written in phosphorescent ink. I waited for the screw to go by and then quickly I read, 'Papi, from tomorrow there'll be five cigarettes and a coconut in your pot every day. Chew the coconut well when you eat it if you want it to do you good. Swallow the chewed meat. Smoke in the morning when the pots are being emptied. Never after coffee in the morning: after soup at twelve the minute you've finished: and after supper. Enclosed there's a bit of pencil lead. Any time you want anything, ask for it on the enclosed scrap of paper. When the sweeper rubs his broom against the door, scratch with your fingers. If he scratches, shove your paper under. Never pass the note unless he's answered your scratching. Put the bit of paper in your ear so as not to have to take your charger out, and your pencil lead anywhere at the bottom of your cell wall. Thumbs up. Love. Ignace, Louis.'

Galgani and Dega had sent me this message. A glow rose in my heart: having such faithful, loving friends gave me a feeling of warmth. And now I returned to my pacing with a cheerful, lively step, with even more faith in the future and a certainty of coming out of this living grave on my feet — one, two, three, four, five, about-turn, etc. And as I walked I thought 'What noble hearts those two have, what strength in doing good. They must certainly be running a very serious risk: maybe even the risk of losing their jobs as clerk and postman. It's really magnificent, what they're doing for me, quite apart from the fact that it must cost them a packet. What quantities of people they must have to buy to reach out from Royale as far as me in my cell in the man-eater.'

Reader, you must know that a dry coconut is full of oil. Its hard white flesh is so full of it that you only have to grate six nuts and put them to soak in hot water to be able to skim off nearly two pints of oil from the surface next morning. The thing we missed worst in this diet of ours was oil: and coconut is crammed with vitamins, too. A nut a day was an almost certain guarantee of health. To put it at the lowest, with that to eat you couldn't dry out or die of mere want. Today it is more than two months that I have been getting food and tobacco without anything going wrong. I take a Red Indian's precautions when I smoke, inhaling deeply and then letting it out little by little, fanning it away with my right hand.

An odd thing happened yesterday. I don't know whether I behaved rightly or wrongly. A warder on duty on the sentry walk leant on the rail and looked down into my cell. He lit a cigarette, took a few drags and then let it drop into my cell. When he had done so he moved off. I waited for him to cross over again and then I ostentatiously crushed the cigarette with my foot. He made a very slight pause: as soon as he realized what I had done he went straight on. Had he been sorry for me? Was he ashamed of the service he belonged to? Or was it a trap? I don't know and it gets me down. When you're having a very bad time, you grow over-sensitive. If that warder meant to be a decent man for the space of a few seconds I shouldn't have wanted to hurt him by my gesture of contempt.

Yes, it was in fact more than two months that I'd been here. As I saw it, this prison was the only one in which there was nothing to be learnt. Because there was no possible line of approach. I was thoroughly used to getting out of myself, and I had a sure-fire way of taking off for a journey among the stars or for an effortless vision of the various stages in my life as a child or a man on the run or for a session of building wonderfully real castles in Spain. What I had to do was to get very tired in the first place. I had to walk for hours without sitting down, without stopping, and thinking of ordinary subjects in the usual sort of way. Then when I was absolutely all in I'd lie down on my plank, rest my head on one half of my blanket, and cover my face with the other. Then the already stale air of the cell would filter slowly through to my mouth and nose. This started off a kind of smothering in my lungs and my head would begin to burn. I'd stifle with heat and lack of air and then suddenly I'd take off. Oh, what indescribable journeys my spirit made and what sensations I had during these voyages! Nights of love truly more vivid and moving than when I was free, even more stirring than the real ones, the nights I'd actually experienced. Yes: and this power of moving through space and time allowed me to sit there with my mother, who had died seventeen years before. I played with her dress and she fondled my curly hair, which she let grow very long when I was about five, as though I was a little girl. I stroked her long, delicate fingers, their skin as soft as silk. She and I laughed about my daring notion of diving into the stream as I'd seen the big boys do, when we were out for a walk. The smallest details of the way her hair was done, the glowing affection of her brilliant eyes, her gentle, unforgettable voice: 'Riri, dear, be good, be very good so that Maman can love you very much. When you're a little bigger you'll be able to dive into the river from high, high up. Just now you're still too small, darling. But never mind, soon you'll be quite a big boy - all too soon, perhaps.' And hand in hand we walked home along the stream. And now there I was, really there in my childhood home. So thoroughly was I there that I placed my hand over Maman's eyes so that she could not see the music but would still go on playing to me. I was actually there: it wasn't just imagination. I was there with her, standing on a chair behind the music stool she was sitting on, and I closed her great eyes firmly with my little hands. Her nimble fingers ran on over the notes, and I heard the Merry Widow right through to the end.

Nobody, neither the merciless prosecutor, nor the shady police, nor that vile Polein, who bought his freedom with perjured evidence, nor the twelve bastards who were such fools as to accept the prosecutor's line and his way of seeing things, nor the Réclusion screws, those worthy associates of the man-eater - absolutely no person and no thing, not even these thick walls or the remoteness of this island lost in the Atlantic Ocean, could prevent my exquisitely happy rose-pink journeys, when I took off for the stars.

I got it wrong when I was working out the time that I should have to be by myself: I only talked about time in hours. That was a mistake. There are periods you have to measure in minutes. For example, the emptying of the pots took place after the handing out of the coffee and bread, about an hour after. It was when the empty pot came back that I found the coconut, the five cigarettes and sometimes a note in phosphorescent ink. At those times I would count the minutes. Not always, but pretty often. It was easy enough, because I regulated each pace so that it took one second, and as I went to and fro in my pendulum swing I made a mental reckoning at each turn. One, I would say. So twelve made a minute. Above all you mustn't think I was worried about whether I'd get that coconut (which was really much the same as my life) nor whether I'd get cigarettes and the indescribable pleasure of smoking ten times during the next twenty-four hours in this tomb - for I smoked each cigarette in two goes. No: sometimes when the coffee came round I was seized with a kind of distress, and for no particular reason I'd be afraid that something had happened to the men who were helping me so generously, at the risk of their own peace and quiet. So I'd wait, and I was never relieved from my anxiety until I saw the coconut. There it would be, and so everything was all right for them.

Slowly, very slowly, the hours, days, weeks, months went by. Now it was almost a year that I had been here. It was exactly eleven months and twenty days that I had not spoken to anyone for more than forty seconds, and that in quick, muttered rather than spoken words. Though I did have one proper conversation aloud. I'd caught a cold and I was coughing a great deal. I thought it was enough to justify going to see the doctor, so I reported sick.

Here was the doctor. To my great astonishment the trap opened. A head appeared in the opening. 'What's the matter with you? What are you complaining of? Lungs? Turn round. Cough.'

God above! What was this - a joke? And yet it is the strict and literal truth. There did exist a doctor in the colonial service who would consent to examine me through a trap and make me turn round a yard away from the door so that he, clapping his ear to the hole, could listen to my chest. Then he said, 'Put your arm out.' I was about to put it out without thinking, but then a kind of self-respect stopping me, I said to this curious medico, 'Thank you, Doctor, but don't you bother. It's not worth troubling.' And at least I did have the strength of mind to make him see I didn't take his examination seriously.

He was brazen enough to say, 'As you like,' and then he walked off. Just as well, for I was on the point of bursting with indignation.

One, two, three, four, five, about-turn. One, two, three, four, five, about-turn. Tirelessly on and on, without stopping: today I walked furiously, my legs all tense: usually they were quite relaxed. It was as though I had to trample something underfoot, after what had just happened. What was there I could trample underfoot? There was only cement down here. No, there were plenty of things I could trample in my pacing. I trampled the spinelessness of that medico who would lend himself to such disgusting conduct merely to be in with the authorities. I trampled the total want of feeling of one class of men for the sufferings and unhappiness of another class of men. I trampled the ignorance of the French nation and its want of interest or curiosity about what happened to the human cargoes that set off from Saint-Martin-de-Ré every two years, or where they went. I trampled the criminal court journalists who'd write a scandalous article about a man over some given crime and then a few months later would not even remember his existence. I trampled the Catholic priests who heard confession and knew what happened in the French penal settlements but nevertheless kept their mouths shut. I trampled the organization of the Ligue des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen that never spoke out and said, 'Stop killing people as surely as if they were guillotined: abolish the mass sadism among the employees of the prison service.' I trampled the fact that not a single organization or association ever questioned the top men of this system to find out how and why eighty per cent of the people who were sent away every two years vanished. I trampled on the official doctors' death certificates - suicide, general debility, death from prolonged under-nourishment, scurvy, tuberculosis, raving madness, senile decay. What else did I trample upon? I don't know, but in any case, after what had just happened I certainly wasn't walking ordinarily - I was crushing something at every step.

One, two, three, four, five . . . and the weariness of the slow flowing hours calmed my silent rebellion. Ten days more and I should have served just half my time of solitary confinement. This really was an anniversary worth celebrating, for apart from my heavy cold I was in good health. I was neither mad nor anywhere near going mad. I was sure, a hundred per cent sure, that I'd come out at the end of this coming year alive and in my right mind.

I was woken up by hushed voices. One said, 'He's completely mummified, Monsieur Durand. How can it be you didn't notice earlier?'

'I don't know. As he hanged himself in the corner of the sentry-walk side, I must have gone by many a time without seeing him.'

'Well, it doesn't matter: but you must admit it makes no sense that you didn't notice him.'

My neighbour on the left had killed himself. That's what I gathered. They carried him away. The door closed. The rules had been strictly obeyed, since the door had been opened and closed in the presence of an 'administrative authority', in this case the governor of the prison - I had recognized his voice. This was the fifth man round me who had vanished in ten weeks.

The day of the celebration came round. I found a tin of Nestlé's milk in the pot. My friends were out of their wits. A fortune to buy it and very serious risks in getting it to me. For me this was a day of triumph over the enemy. So I promised not to take off for somewhere else. Here I was in the Réclusion. A year had gone by since I came in and I was fit to make a break and go off tomorrow if the occasion turned up. This was a fine positive thing to be able to state and I was proud of it.

Something out of the ordinary happened: the afternoon sweeper brought me a note from my friends. 'Keep your heart up. You've only got a year left to do. We know your health's OK. We're pretty well too. Love, Louis, Ignace. If you can, send a line back at once by the person who gives you this.'

On the scrap of blank paper that came with the note I wrote, 'Thanks for everything. I'm strong and hope to be the same in a year's time, thanks to you. Can you give me news Clousiot, Maturette?' And now here was the sweeper, scratching at my door. Quickly I slipped out the paper, which disappeared at once. All that day and part of the night there I was, with my feet firmly on the ground and as fit as I had often promised myself I should be. In a year's time I was going to be sent to one of the islands. Royale or Saint-Joseph? I'd fill myself to overflowing with talk, tobacco and schemes for another break right away.

The next day I set about the first of the three hundred and sixty-five that I still had to do, and I did so feeling happy about my fate. I was right for the eight months that followed. But the ninth, things went bad. That morning, when the pots were being emptied, the man carrying the coconut was caught red-handed just as he was shoving my pot back, with the nut and the five cigarettes already in it.

This was so serious an incident that for some minutes the rule of silence was forgotten. You could very distinctly hear the blows the unfortunate prisoner received. Then the gasping cry like a man given a mortal wound. My flap opened and a warder's furious face bawled at me, 'You'll lose nothing of what's coming to you by waiting!'

'Whenever you like, you fat sod!' I cried, ready to burst at what I'd heard of the way they'd treated the poor bastard.

This happened at seven o'clock. It was only at eleven that a group led by the deputy-governor came for me. They opened this door that had been closed on me twenty months before and had never been opened in all that time. I was at the back of my cell, grasping my mug, ready to defend myself and perfectly determined to hit as hard and as often as I could. This was for two reasons: first, so that a handful of warders shouldn't beat me up and get away with it; and secondly, so as to be knocked out the quicker. Nothing of the kind happened. 'Confinee, come out.'

'If I'm to come out to be beaten up, you can expect me to defend myself. I'm not coming out to be attacked on all sides. I'm better placed here to bash the first man that touches me.'

'You're not going to be hit, Charriere.'

'Who says so?'

'I do. The deputy-governor.'

'Are you to be trusted?'

'Don't be rude: it'll get you nowhere. I give you my word you won't be hit. Come on, now, out of it.' I held on to my mug. 'You can keep that. You won't have to use it.'

'OK.' I came out, and with the deputy-governor and six warders round me I went right along the corridor. The moment I reached the courtyard my head spun and my eyes closed, stabbed by the light. At last I made out the little building where we'd been received. There were a dozen warders there. Without pushing me they took me to the administrative office. A man, covered with blood, was lying there on the ground, groaning. A clock on the wall said eleven and I thought, 'They've been torturing the poor sod for four hours.' The governor was sitting behind his desk: the deputy took a chair next to him.

'Charrière, how long have you been receiving food and cigarettes?'

'He must have told you.'

'I'm asking you.'

'As for me, I've got amnesia..I don't even know what happened yesterday.'

'Are you trying to make game of me?'

'No. I'm astonished it's not in my file. A blow on the head and I lost my memory.'

The governor was so surprised by this answer that he said, 'Ask Royale whether there is any such thing on his record.' While they were telephoning he went on, 'You remember you're called Charrière all right?'

'Oh yes.' And quickly, so as to unsettle him all the more, I said in a mechanical voice, 'My name's Charrière, I was born in 1906 in the Ardèche and I was sentenced to life in Paris, Seine.' His eyes were as round as saucers, and I sensed I had shaken him.

'Did you have your coffee and your bread this morning?'

'Yes.'

'What vegetable did you have last night?'

'Don't know.'

'So according to what you say, you've no memory at all?'

'None at all for things that happen. Faces, yes: I remember them. For example I know it was you that received me one time. When? I can't tell.'

'So you don't know how much longer you've got to serve?'

'Out of my lifer? Why, until I die, I suppose.'

'No, no. Out of your solitary.'

'They've given me solitary? What for?'

'Come, this really is the limit! God above! Don't put me into a rage. You're not going to tell me you don't remember you're doing two years for an escape. Don't you try it on to that extent!'

Then I finished him off completely. 'What, me escape? Governor, I'm a responsible man and I can answer for all my doings. Come with me and have a look at my cell: you'll soon see whether I've escaped or not.'

At this moment a screw said, 'Royale on the line, sir.'

He took the telephone. 'Nothing? Odd: he claims he has amnesia. What gave it him? A blow on the head ... Right, I understand. He's swinging the lead. I'll find out ... I'm sorry I troubled you, Governor. I'll check on it. Good-bye. Yes, I'll let you know how it goes. Now then, Charlie Chaplin, just let's have a look at your head. Well, yes; there is quite a long scar. How come you remember that you've had no memory since they gave you this bang, eh? Answer me that one, will you?'

'I can't explain it. I just know I remember the blow, that my name is Charrière, and a few other things.'

'What are you driving at, when all's said and done?'

'That's just the question. You ask me how long I've been having food and tobacco. And this is what I say: I don't know whether it's the first time or the thousandth. What with my loss of memory, I just can't tell you. That's all: do what you like about it.'

'What I like is easy enough. You've been eating too much for a long while: well, now you can lose a little weight. No-supper till the end of his sentence.'

That same day I had a note at the time of the second sweeping. Unfortunately I couldn't read it, it not being phosphorescent. At night I lit a cigarette that I still had from the day before and that had been so well hidden in the plank they had not found it when they searched. Drawing on it, I managed to read, 'Cleaner didn't blab. He said it was only second time he gave you anything to eat. Did it by himself. Because he knew you in France. Nobody on Royale will get into trouble. Courage.'

So there I was, deprived of my coconut and cigarettes, and cut off from news of my friends on Royale. As well as that, they'd done away with my evening meal. I'd got used to not having to feel hungry; and what's more, those ten periods when I could smoke helped fill the day for me and part of the night. I wasn't only thinking of myself, either, but also of the poor bastard they'd beaten up. I hoped he wouldn't be too severely punished.

One, two, three, four, five, about-turn ... one, two, three, four, five, about-turn. You're not going to be able to stand this starvation-diet as easily as all that, cock; and since you're going to eat so little, maybe you'd better change your tactics. Lying down as long as possible, for example, so as not to waste any strength. The less I moved about, the fewer calories I burn up. Sit for hours and hours during the daytime. It was quite another kind of life I was going to have to learn. Four months: that was one hundred and twenty days to get through. With the diet they'd just put me on, how many days would it take before I became thoroughly anaemic? Two months at least. So the two vital months lay ahead of me. If I grew too weak, every kind of illness would have a perfect breeding-place in my body. I made up my mind to stay lying down from six in the evening until six in the morning. I'd walk between coffee and the emptying of the pots, or roughly two hours. After the midday soup, about two hours more. Four hours walking altogether. All the rest of the time, sitting or lying down. It would be hard to take off without being physically tired. Still, I'd try to do it.

Today, after I'd spent a long while thinking about my friends and the poor bastard who'd been so brutally ill-treated, I began to follow this new routine. I did fairly well, although the hours seemed to me to take longer to go by and although my legs, which hadn't been in action now for hours on end, kept tingling with a desire to move.

This way of life had been going on for ten days now. Now I was hungry all the time, right round the clock. A continual weariness had hold of me and it never let go. I missed my coconut terribly; and to some extent the cigarettes. I went to bed very early and as quickly as I could I took off from my cell. Yesterday I was in Paris, at the Rat Mort, drinking champagne with friends: London Antonio was there - he came from the Balearics in the first place, but he spoke French like a Parisian and English like a genuine rosbif. The next day, at the Maronnier in the boulevard de Clichy, he put five revolver bullets into a friend of his, killing him. In the underworld friendship can change into mortal hatred very quickly. Yes, I was in Paris yesterday, dancing to an accordion at the Petit Jardin in the Avenue de Saint-Ouen, where the customers were Corsicans or Marseillais to a man. The friends who passed before my eyes during this imaginary journey were so utterly convincing that I had no doubt they were really there, any more than I doubted my presence in all those night-spots where I'd had such fun.

So with this very low diet, and without much walking, I reached the same result that I used to get from fatigue. These pictures of my former life had such a power of taking me out of my cell that I really spent more hours a free man than a convict in solitary confinement.

Only a month to do now. For the last three all I'd had to eat was a hunk of bread in the morning and at noon hot thin soup with its scrap of boiled meat. I was so continually hungry that the moment it was given to me I examined the little lump to see whether it was just a bit of skin – and often enough it was.

I'd lost a great deal of weight, and I realized just how important the coconut had been in keeping me healthy and sane in this terrible exclusion from life – the coconut I'd been lucky to have for twenty months.

I was all on edge this morning, after I'd drunk my coffee. I allowed myself to eat half my bread, which was something I never did. Ordinarily I broke it into four more or less equal pieces and ate them at six o'clock, noon, six again and then a little bit during the night. 'Why did you do that, man?' I asked myself angrily. 'Is it now, near the end, that you're going to let yourself fall to pieces?' 'I'm hungry, and I've no strength left.' 'Don't be such a fool. How could you have any strength left, eating what you eat? You're weak, fair enough, but you're not ill, and that's the whole point – you win. Looking at it reasonably, and with a little luck, the man-eater ought to lose.' I was sitting there on my concrete block of a stool, after my two hours of walking. Thirty more days, or seven hundred and twenty hours, and the door would open and they'd say to me, 'Confinée Charrière, come out. You've finished your two years of solitary.' And what should I say? This. 'Yes, I've finished my two years of martyrdom.' Come, no! That wouldn't do. If it's the governor you tried the loss-of-memory caper with, you must go on with it: quite calmly. You must say, 'What, am I pardoned? Am I going back to France? Is my lifer over?' just so as to see his expression and to convince him that the hunger he condemned you to was unjust. 'Man, what's wrong with you?' Just or unjust, the governor doesn't give a damn whether he was wrong. What importance could it have for a mind like that? You're not such a fool as to believe he's going to feel remorse just for having punished you unjustly? I forbid you to suppose, now or at any other time, that gaoler can be a normal human being. No man worthy of the name could possibly belong to that body. In life you get used to everything, even to being a wicked old sod throughout your career. Maybe when he's close to the grave, but only then, the fear of God (if he has any religion) may make him anxious and repentant. No, not out of real remorse for the stinking things he's been guilty of; but out of dread that his God may send him down too, in his turn. So when you come out and you're sent to one of the islands - it doesn't matter which - you're never to have any dealings with that tribe. Each is on his own side of a clearly marked boundary. On the one side mean flabbiness, pettifogging heartless authority, instinctive and automatic sadism: and on the other, me and men like me, who have committed serious crimes, to be sure, but in whom suffering has brought out marvellous qualities - compassion, kindness, self-sacrifice, magnanimity, courage. In all sincerity, I'd rather be a convict than a gaoler.

Only twenty days to go. I was really weak now. I'd noticed that my hunk of bread was always among the smaller bits. Who could have sunk so low as to pick out a special piece for me? For some days my soup had been nothing but hot water, and the meat was always a bone with very little on it, or else it was a bit of skin. I was afraid I'd fall sick. This haunted me all the time. I was so weak that without any effort I could go into dreams of every kind, wide awake. This deep weariness and the really serious depression that came with it worried me badly. I tried to stand up to it and I managed to get through the twenty-four hours of every day; but it was hard.

There was a scratching at my door. I snatched in the note. It was phosphorescent and it came from Dega and Galgani. 'Send a line. Very anxious about your health. Only nineteen days left: keep your heart up. Louis, Ignace.'

There was a scrap of paper and a bit of lead. I wrote, 'Holding out: very weak. Thanks. Papi.' And when the broom scraped against my door again I pushed back the note. No cigarettes, no coconut, but this note meant more than all those things. The proof of this wonderful, lasting friendship gave me the sudden lift I needed. They knew what state I was in outside, and if I fell ill my friends would certainly go and see the doctor and urge him to look after me properly. They were right: only nineteen days to go. I was coming towards the end of this exhausting race against death and madness. I must not fall ill. It was up to me to move as little as possible so as to use up only the essential calories. I'd do away with the morning walk and the one in the afternoon – two hours each. That was the only way of holding out. So all night, for twelve hours on end, I lay down; and the other twelve hours I sat on my stone bench, never stirring. From time to time I got up and did a few knee-bends and arm movements; then I sat down again. Only ten days left.

I was walking about in Trinidad, lulled by the one-stringed Javanese fiddles with their plaintive tunes when a hideous, inhuman roar brought me back to earth. The shout came from the cell behind mine or from another very near to it. I heard, 'Come down here into my pit, you bleeding sod. Aren't you tired of watching me from above? Don't you understand you lose half the fun – you can't see down into this dark hole.'

'Shut up, or you'll cop it really hard.'

'Ha, ha! Just hear me laugh, you silly bastard. Do you think you can find anything worse than this silence? Punish me as much as you like: knock me about if you feel like it, you ugly son of a bitch: but you'll never find anything to come up to this silence that you force me to live in. No, no, no! I can't stand it any more, I can't stand never hearing a word! It was three years ago I ought to have said "Shit to you, you bleeding sod!" And I've been such a bloody fool that I've waited thirty-six months before telling you what I think of you, because I was afraid of being punished. What I think of you and everybody like you, you lousy rotten set of screws.'

A few moments later the door opened and I heard, 'No, not like that! Put it on him backwards – it works better that way.'

And the poor bastard roared out, 'Put your stinking strait-jacket on whichever way you like, you shit! Put it on backwards and tighten it till I can't breathe. Put your knee in and pull hard on the laces. That won't stop me telling you your mother was a bitch and that's why you're a heap of shit yourself.'

They must have gagged him, because I heard nothing more.

The door closed again. This scene must have shaken the young warder, for a few minutes later he stopped in front of my cell and said, 'He must have gone mad.'

'You think so? Yet everything he said made very good sense.'

That knocked the screw flat. He went off, saying, 'Well, I never expected that from you!'

All this had snatched me away from that island full of kind people and from the fiddles, the Hindu girls' tits, and Port of Spain harbour, and it had dumped me down again in the grim reality of the Réclusion.

Ten days more: that meant two hundred and forty hours to get through. These days were passing by more easily: either it was the idea of keeping still that was bearing fruit, or it was the lift my friends' letter had given me. Or more likely I felt stronger because of the idea of comparison that forced itself upon my mind: here I was within two hundred and forty hours of being let out of solitary; I was weak, but my brain was all right and my energy only wanted a little more bodily strength behind it to be restored. Whereas a couple of yards behind me, the other side of the wall, there was a poor type who was moving into the first stage of madness by what was probably the worst possible door – the one of violence. He'd not live long, because his mutiny would provide them with the opportunity of giving him the whole satisfying range of treatment they'd carefully worked out so as to kill him in the most scientific manner possible. I blamed myself for feeling stronger just because the other chap was beaten. I wondered whether I was one of those selfish brutes who go out in the winter wearing good shoes, good gloves and a fur-lined coat and who watch the ordinary people going to work, badly dressed and frozen with cold or at least with their hands blue from the morning frost – watch them running for the underground or the first bus and feel warmer than before and take a much livelier pleasure in their fur lining. Quite often in life everything is a matter of comparison. True enough, I've got ten years: but Papillon, he's got life. True enough, I've got a lifer: but I'm twenty-eight, whereas he's fifty, even if he has only got fifteen years.

Right, here I was coming to the end of it, and I was confident I should be quite fit from every point of view – health, spirit and energy – for a truly outstanding break. The first one had been talked about: the second would be carved in the stone of one of the prison walls. There was no question about it. I'd be off before six months were over, and that was for sure.

This was the last night I was to spend in solitary. Seventeen thousand five hundred and eight hours had passed since I walked into cell 234. My door had been opened once, for me to be taken to the governor for punishment. Apart from my neighbour, with whom I exchanged a few monosyllables a few seconds every day, I had been spoken to four times. Once to tell me that at the whistle you had to lower your plank: that was the first day. Once the doctor had said, 'Turn round. Cough.' There had been a longer, livelier conversation with the governor. And then the other day a few words with the warder who had been shocked by the poor type going mad. It didn't amount to a very great deal by way of light relief. I went calmly to sleep, with just this single thought - tomorrow they'll open my door for good. Tomorrow I'll see the sun, and if they send me to Royale I'll breathe the sea air. Tomorrow I'll be free. I burst out laughing. Free? What do you mean? Tomorrow you'll officially begin on your sentence of hard labour for life. Is that what you call free? I know, I know: but there's no comparison between that and the life I've had to bear. What state will I find Clousiot and Maturette in?

At six o'clock they gave me coffee and bread. I felt like saying, 'But I go out today. You've got it wrong.' Then I quickly remembered I'd lost my memory, and if I was to go and acknowledge I'd been stuffing the governor up like this, who knows but he might give me thirty days black-hole to be served right away. For whatever happened the law stated that I had to leave the solitary confinement prison of Saint-Joseph today, 26 June 1936. In four months time I would be thirty.

Eight o'clock. I'd eaten my whole hunk of bread. I'd get something to eat in the camp. The door opened. The deputy-governor and two warders appeared.

'Charrière, your sentence is finished. This is 26 June 1936. Follow us.'

I walked out. In the courtyard the sun was already bright enough to dazzle me. A kind of general weakness came over me. My legs went soft and black spots danced in front of my eyes. Yet I'd not gone more than fifty yards; and of them only thirty were in the sun.

When I reached the administration block I saw Maturette and Clousiot. Maturette was skin and bone - hollow cheeks, sunken eyes. Clousiot was lying on a stretcher. He was grey and already he smelt of death. I thought, 'Brothers, you aren't very pretty. Do I look like that?' I longed to see myself in a mirror. I said to them, 'You OK, mates?'

They made no reply. Once more I said, 'You OK?'

'Yes,' said Maturette softly.

I wanted to tell them that now solitary was over we were allowed to talk. I kissed Clousiot on the cheek. He looked at me with his shining eyes and smiled. 'Good-bye, Papillon,' he said.

'No, no. Don't say that!

'I've had it: done for.'

He died a few days later in the hospital on Royale. He was thirty-two and he had been sent down for twenty years for a bicycle theft he hadn't committed. But here was the governor coming.

'Bring them in. Maturette and Clousiot, you've behaved well. So I'll put Conduct good on your file. As for you, Charrière, you committed a serious crime, so I'll put what you deserve - Conduct bad.'

'Excuse me, Governor, but what crime did I commit?'

'You really don't remember the finding of the cigarettes and the coconut?'

'No. Quite honestly I don't.'

'Come now, what diet have you been on these last four months?'

'How do you mean? You mean the food? Always the same ever since I came in.'

'Well, that crows everything! What did you eat yesterday evening?'

'As usual - whatever they gave me. What do I know about it? I don't remember. Maybe beans or fried rice: or some other vegetable.'

'So you do have supper then?'

'I should bloody think I do! You don't imagine I throw my bowl out, do you?'

'No: it's no good, I give it up. All right, I'll withdraw the conduct bad. Monsieur X, make out another discharge ticket. I'll give you conduct good. All right?'

'It's only fair. I've done nothing to deserve anything else.' And it was with these last words that we left the office.

The great gate of the Réclusion opened to let us through. With just one warder as an escort we walked slowly down the road leading to the camp. We were high over the sea – white foam, brilliant light. Opposite there was Royale, covered with green trees and red roofs. Devil's Island, grim and harsh. I asked the warder for us to be allowed to sit down for a few minutes. He said yes. We sat there, one on Clousiot's right and the other on his left, and without even noticing it we held hands. This contact moved us strangely and without a word we embraced. The warder said, 'Come on, boys. We must get moving.'

And slowly, very slowly, we went down to the camp; there we went in side by side, still holding hands, followed by the two stretcher-bearers carrying our dying friend.

Life on Royale

The moment we were in the yard we were surrounded by the convicts, all full of kindness for us. Once again I saw Pierrot le Fou, Jean Sartrou, Colondini and Chissilia. The warder told us we were all three to go to the infirmary, and as we crossed the yard at least twenty men went with us. In a few minutes Maturette and I had a dozen packets of cigarettes and tobacco there in front of us, with piping hot café au lait and the best chocolate. Everybody wanted to give us something. The orderly gave Clousiot a camphor injection and some adrenalin for his heart. A very thin Negro said, 'Orderly, give him my vitamin tablets: he needs them more than me.' This display of solidarity and kindness was deeply moving.

Pierre le Bordelais asked me, 'Would you like some dough?

I've got time to pass the hat round before you leave for Royale.'

'No, thanks very much: I have some. But you know I'm going to Royale, then?'

'Yes, the clerk told us. All three of you. Indeed, I think you're all going to hospital.'

The orderly was a Corsican strong-arm man from the mountains. His name was Essari. I knew him very well later on: one day I'll tell his whole fascinating story. These two hours in the infirmary went by very fast. We ate well and we drank well. Full and happy, we set off for Royale. Nearly all the time Clousiot kept his eyes shut, except when I went over and put my hand on his forehead. Then he opened them - they were already clouded - and said to me, 'Friend Papi, you and I are what you call real friends.'

'We're more than that; we're brothers,' I replied.

Still with just one warder we went down to the shore. Clousiot's stretcher in the middle, Maturette and I on each side. At the camp gate all the convicts wished us good-bye and good luck. We thanked them, in spite of their protests. Pierrot le Fou hung a knapsack round my neck: it was full of tobacco, cigarettes, chocolate and tins of Nestlé's milk. Maturette had one too. He didn't know who had given it to him.

Fernandez, the medical orderly, and the warder were the only ones to go down to the quay with us. He handed us each a paper for the hospital on Royale. I gathered that it was the convict orderlies Essari and Fernandez who were sending us to hospital, without consulting the medicos. Here was the boat. Six rowers, two armed warders in the stern-sheets and another at the tiller. One of the boatmen was Chapar, of the Marseilles stock-exchange business. All right, let's go. The oars dipped into the sea, and as he rowed Chapar said to me, 'OK, Papi? Did you get the coconut all the time?'

'No, not the last four months.'

'I know. There was an accident. The chap behaved well though. I was the only one he knew, but he didn't grass.'

'What happened to him?'

'He's dead.'

'You don't say so! What of?'

'According to an orderly, it seems they burst his liver, kicking him.'

We landed at the wharf on Royale, the biggest of the three islands. The bakery clock said three. The afternoon sun was really hot: it dazzled me and warmed me more than I cared for. A warder called for two stretcher-bearers. Two strongly built convicts, immaculately dressed in white and each wearing a black leather wrist-band, picked Clousiot up as though he weighed no more than a feather: Maturette and I followed behind. A warder came along after us, carrying some papers.

A cobbled road, about four yards wide: heavy going. Fortunately the two stretcher-bearers stopped every now and then for us to catch up. When we did so I sat down on the shaft of the stretcher, just by Clousiot's head, and I put my hand gently on his forehead. Each time he smiled, opened his eyes and said, 'Good old Papi.'

Maturette took his hand. 'Is that you, boy?' whispered Clousiot. He seemed unspeakably happy, having us close to him. During one of the last halts, we met a fatigue-party going off to work: they were almost all convicts belonging to my convoy. All of them, as they went by, said something friendly. We reached the plateau, and there we saw the island's highest authorities sitting in the shade in front of a square white building. We went up to Major Barrot, nicknamed Coco sec, and the other heads of the establishment. Without getting up and without any formalities the major said to us, 'So it wasn't too tough in solitary, then? Who's the man on the stretcher?'

'It's Clousiot.'

He had a look at him and then said, 'Take them to hospital. When they come out, let me know, so I can see them before they're sent to the camp.'

At the hospital they put us to bed - very clean beds with sheets and pillows - in a big, well-lit ward. The first orderly I saw was Chatal, who had been in the high-security ward at Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. He attended to Clousiot right away and told a warder to call the doctor. The doctor came at about five o'clock. After a long, careful examination, I saw him shake his head, looking concerned. He wrote out a prescription and then came over to me. He said to Chatal, 'Papillon and I are not very good friends.'

'Well, that's surprising, Doctor, because he's a decent type.'

'Maybe. But he doesn't care for me.'

'How come?'

'Because of an examination I carried out in the Réclusion.

'Doctor,' I said, 'do you call listening to my chest through a trap an examination?'

'The service lays down that a convict's door cannot be opened.'

'Fine, Doctor: but I hope for your sake you're only lent to the service and not a part of it.'

'We'll talk about that some other time. I'll try to set you on your feet again, you and your friend. As for the other one, I'm afraid it may be too late.'

Chatal told me he'd been interned on the islands, under suspicion of preparing a break. He also said that Jesus, the character who had swindled me during my escape, had been murdered by a leper. He didn't know the leper's name, and I wondered whether it might have been one of those who had helped us so generously.

The life of the convicts on the Iles du Salut was completely different from what you might suppose. Most of the men were extremely dangerous, dangerous for various reasons. In the first place, everybody was well fed, because everything was the subject of some racket - spirits, cigarettes, coffee, chocolate, sugar, meat, fish, fresh vegetables, coconuts, crayfish, etc. So they were all perfectly fit and the climate was very healthy. The men with limited sentences were the only ones with any chance of being let out: those with life, those with no hope at all, were all dangerous. Everybody, prisoners and warders, were involved in the rackets that were going on all the time. It was not easy to see the pattern at first. The warders' wives looked out for young convicts to do their housework, and quite often took them as lovers, too. These ones were called houseboys. Some were gardeners, others cooks. It was this class of transportee that acted as the link between the convict camp and the warders. The other convicts didn't look upon the houseboys with disfavour, because it was thanks to them that any racket was possible at all. But they were not considered altogether clean - not pure. No real member of the underworld would lower himself to do jobs of this sort. Nor to be a turnkey: nor to work in the warders' mess. On the other hand, they would pay a great deal for jobs that had nothing to do with the screws - cleaners, sweepers, buffalo-drivers, hospital orderlies, prison gardeners, butchers, bakers, boatmen, postmen, lighthouse keepers. The real hard men would accept any of these jobs. A hard man would never work on the fatigues of repairing walls or roads or flights of steps, nor at planting coconut palms – that is to say, work in the full sun or under the supervision of the screws. Working hours were from seven until noon and from two o'clock till six. This may give you some idea of the atmosphere with all these different people living together, prisoners and warders making up a positive little town in which everything was discussed and commented upon, and where everybody's activities were known to everybody else.

Dega and Galgani came to spend Sunday with me in the hospital. We had aïlloli with fish, fish soup, potatoes, cheese, coffee and white wine. We all of us, Chatal, Dega, Galgani, Maturette, Grandet and I, ate this meal in Chatal's room. They asked me to tell them about my break in all its smallest details. Dega had decided not to make any further attempt at escape. He was expecting a pardon from France that would shorten his sentence by five years. Counting the three years he'd served in France and the three here, that would only leave him four to do. He had resigned himself to serving that long. As for Galgani, he said a Corsican senator was looking after him.

Now it was my turn. I asked them what were the best places here for an escape. There was a general outcry. For his part, Dega had never even thought of the idea; nor had Galgani. Chatal was of the opinion that a garden might be a useful place for preparing a raft. Grandet told me he was a blacksmith in the Public Works. This was a workshop that had everything, he said – painters, carpenters, smiths, builders, plumbers: close on a hundred and twenty men. Its job was looking after the establishment's buildings. Dega was the head accountant and he would put me into any job I wanted. The choice was up to me. Grandet offered me half his place as head of a gambling table, so that with what I got from the men who played I could live decently without having to spend what I had in my charger. Later I found that this was a very profitable job, but exceedingly dangerous.

Sunday flashed by. 'Five o'clock already,' said Dega, who was wearing a handsome watch. 'We must get back to the camp.' As he left, Dega gave me five hundred francs to play poker with, because now and then there were very good games in our ward. Grandet gave me a splendid lock-back knife that he had tempered himself. It was a formidable weapon. 'Keep it on you, day and night.'

'What about the searches?'

'Most of the screws who carry them out are Arab turnkeys. When a man is listed dangerous, they never find any weapon, even if they actually put their hands on it.'

'We'll meet again in the camp,' said Grandet.

Before he left, Galgani told me he'd already reserved me a place in his corner and that we'd be in the same gourbi (the members of a gourbi all eat together and money that belongs to one belongs to all). As for Dega, he did not sleep in the camp but in a bedroom in the administration block.

We had been here three days now, but as I spent my nights at Clousiot's side I had not really gathered how life went on in this ward of about sixty men. But then Clousiot took a bad turn and he was moved into a room where there was already another very sick man. Chatal crammed him with morphia. He was afraid he wouldn't live through the night.

Thirty beds on each side of a ten-foot passage running down the middle of the big ward: almost all the beds occupied. The whole room lit by two paraffin lamps. Maturette said to me, 'They're playing poker down there.' I went over to the players. There were four of them.

'Can I make the fifth?'

'Yes. Sit down. A hundred francs is the minimum raise. Three hundred to come in. Here's three hundred francs' worth of chips.'

I gave two hundred to Maturette to keep. A Parisian named Dupont said to me, 'We play the English game, with no joker. You know it?'

'Yes.'

'Your deal, then.'

The speed these men played at was unbelievable. The raises had to be very quick or the head of the table would say, 'Slow raise' and you had to hold everything. It was here I discovered a fresh class of convicts - the gamblers. They lived on gambling, amidst gambling. Nothing apart from gambling interested them. They forgot everything, what they had been, the length of their sentences, all the things they might do to change their lives. Whether their opponent was a decent guy or not, only one thing interested them - gambling.

We played all night long. We stopped when the coffee came round. I won one thousand three hundred francs. I was going towards my bed when Paulo caught me up and asked me to lend him two hundred to go on playing double-handed belote. He needed two hundred and he only had one. 'Here's three hundred. We'll go splits,' I said.

'Thanks, Papillon: you're certainly the guy they said you were. We'll be friends.' He held out his hand, I shook it, and he went off beaming with delight.

Clousiot died that morning. In a moment of clear-mindedness the evening before he had told Chatal not to give him any more morphia. 'I want to die in my right senses, sitting up in my bed with my friends beside me,' he said.

It was strictly forbidden to go into the isolation rooms, but Chatal took the responsibility and our friend was able to die in our arms. I closed his eyes. Maturette was quite shattered with grief.

'Clousiot's gone, the friend we went right through our splendid break with. They've thrown him to the sharks.'

When I heard the words, 'They've thrown him to the sharks,' my blood ran cold. On the islands there was in fact no graveyard for the convicts. When a prisoner died they went out to sea at six o'clock, the time of sunset, and threw him in between Saint-Joseph and Royale, in a place infested by sharks.

My friend's death made the hospital unbearable for me. I sent to tell Dega I would be going out in two days' time. He sent a note saying, 'Ask Chatal to get you a fortnight's rest in the camp: that way you'll have time to pick a job you like.' Maturette was going to stay in a little longer. Chatal might be able to take him on as an assistant orderly.

As soon as I left the hospital I was taken up before Major Barrot, Coco sec, in the administration block. 'Papillon,' he said, 'I wanted to see you before you were sent to the camp. You have a very valuable friend here, my chief accountant, Louis Dega. He says you don't deserve the reports that they have sent us from France, and that as you look upon yourself as an innocent man unjustly condemned, it is natural you should be in a state of perpetual revolt. I must tell you I don't altogether agree with him on that point. But what I'd like to know is what state of mind you're in at present.'

'In the first place, sir, and so I can give you an answer, could you let me know what the notes on my file actually say?’

‘Look for yourself.’ And he passed me a yellow folder in which I read roughly this –

‘Henri Charrière, nicknamed Papillon, born 16 November 1906 at – in the Ardèche, condemned at the Seine Assizes to transportation with hard labour for life for wilful homicide. Dangerous from every point of view: to be carefully watched. Not to benefit from privileged employment.

Caen Prison: Incurable prisoner. Capable of rousing and directing a mutiny. To be kept under constant watch.

Saint-Martin-de-Ré: Amenable to discipline but undoubtedly has great influence over his companions. Will attempt to escape from any place of confinement whatsoever.

Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni: Committed a violent assault upon three warders and a turnkey to escape from the hospital. Brought back from Colombia. Good conduct during inquiry period. Given light sentence of two years solitary confinement.

Réclusion de Saint-Joseph: Conduct good until release.’

‘What with all this, my dear Papillon,’ said the governor as I handed him back the file, ‘we don’t feel altogether comfortable about having you as a boarder. Would you like to come to an agreement with me?’

‘Why not? It depends on the agreement, though.’

‘There’s no sort of doubt that you’re a man who’ll do everything possible to escape from the islands in spite of every difficulty. You may even succeed. Now from my point of view, I still have five months of governing this island. Do you know what an escape costs a governor here? One year’s ordinary pay. That is to say, the total loss of the colonial bonus. As well as leave delayed for six months and reduced by three. And if the inquiry shows there was negligence on the governor’s part, he may lose a stripe. It’s serious, as you see. Now if I want to do my job properly I have no right to shut you up in a cell or a black-hole just because it’s possible you might escape. Unless I think up some imaginary crime. And that’s something I don’t choose to do. So I’d like you to give me your word not to try to escape until I leave the islands. Five months.’

‘Governor, I give you my word of honour that I shan’t leave while you're here, so long as it doesn't exceed six months.'

'I'm leaving in rather under five: that's certain.'

'All right. You ask Dega, and he'll tell you I keep my word.'

'I'm sure you do.'

'But in return, I'll ask you for something.'

'What?'

'That during the five months I must spend here, I should be allowed to have the jobs now that I might have had later, and even perhaps be allowed to change islands.'

'All right. Agreed. But this must remain strictly between ourselves.'

'Yes, Governor.'

He sent for Dega, who persuaded him that my place was not with the good conducts, but with the crooks in the 'dangerous' building, where all my friends were lodged. I was given my full issue of convict's equipment, and the governor added some white trousers and jackets that had been confiscated in the tailors' shop.

So I was carrying two pairs of brand new, perfectly white trousers, three jackets and a straw hat as I made my way to the central camp, accompanied by a screw. To get there from the little administrative block we had to cross the whole plateau. We went past the warders' hospital, going along the outside of the thirteen-foot wall that surrounded the entire establishment. When we had got almost right round the huge rectangle we reached the main gate. Penal Settlement. Ile Royale Section. The enormous door was made of wood, and it stood wide open. It must have been nearly twenty feet high. Two guard-rooms with four warders in each. A sergeant sitting on a chair. No rifles: everybody had revolvers. I also saw five or six Arab turnkeys.

When I appeared in the gateway all the warders came out. The chief warder, a Corsican, said, 'Here's a new one: a big boy.' The turnkeys were preparing to search me, but he stopped them. 'Don't buggery about, making him show all his kit. Go on inside, Papillon. You've got lots of friends waiting for you in the special block, I'm sure. My name's Soffrani. Good luck here on the islands.'

'Thanks, Chief.' And I walked into a huge yard in which there stood three great buildings. I followed the warder to one of them. Over the door it said Block A: Special Category.

Standing in front of the wide-open door the warder shouted, 'Leader!' An aged convict appeared. 'Here's a new one,' said the warder, and walked off.

I made my way into a very large rectangular hall in which there lived a hundred and twenty men. An iron bar, like the one in that first building at Saint-Laurent, ran down each of its longer sides, broken only by the gaps for the door: this door was an iron grill, only closed at night. Between the wall and the bar were stretched the pieces of very taut canvas that were falsely called hammocks and that served as beds. These so-called hammocks were very comfortable and hygienic. Each had two shelves fixed over it, and on these you could put your things: there was one for clothes and one for your food, mug, etc. Between the lines of hammocks ran the alley, a passage ten feet wide. Here too the men lived in little groups – gourbis. Some of these messes had only two men, but in some there were as many as ten.

I was scarcely inside before convicts dressed in white came hurrying from all round. 'Papi, come over here.' 'No, come along with us.' Grandet took my bag and said, 'He's going to gourbi with me.' I followed him. They set up the canvas I was to lie on and stretched it tight. 'Catch. Here's a feather pillow, brother,' said Grandet. I found many friends. A great many Corsicans and types from Marseilles, and a few Parisians: all acquaintances from back in France or men I'd known in the Santé, the Conciergerie or in the convoy. But I was astonished at seeing them and I asked, 'How come you're not at work, this time of day?' Everyone laughed very heartily. 'Oh, you can write that one out in capitals! The characters in this block who work never do more than an hour a day. Then we come back to the gourbi.' This really was a warm welcome. I hoped it would last. But there was one thing I noticed in no time at all – a thing I had never expected: in spite of these few days spent in hospital I was going to have to learn how to live in a group all over again.

Then something quite extraordinary happened. A fellow came in, dressed in white and carrying a tray covered with a spotless cloth: he called out, 'Steak, steak, who wants beef-steak?' Gradually he reached our corner, stopped, lifted the linen, and there, in neat rows just like you see them in a French butcher's shop, there was a whole trayful of steaks. It was clear, that Grandet was a daily customer, because the type didn't ask whether he wanted any but how many he should pick out.

'Five.'

'Rump or butt?'

'Rump. What do I owe you? Make out the bill, because now there's one more of us it won't be the same.'

The steak-seller brought out a notebook and began doing sums. 'That makes one hundred and thirty-five francs in all.'

'Take it out of this and then start a clean sheet.'

When the man had gone Grandet said to me, 'You die like a dog here if you've got no cash. But there's one way you can get it all the time – a racket.'

In penal, a racket meant the way each man sets about getting hold of money. The camp cook sold the meat meant for the prisoners – sold it as steaks. When it was issued to him at the kitchen he cut off round about half. According to the pieces, he prepared joints, steaks or stewing beef. Some was sold to the warders through their wives and some to the convicts who had the money to pay for it. Of course the cook handed over part of what he made this way to the screw in charge of the kitchen. The first block where he peddled his wares was always Block A, Special Category – our building.

So a racket meant the cook who sold meat and dripping; the baker who sold fancy bread and the long thin white loaves meant for the warders; the butcher who sold meat too; the medical orderly who sold injections; the clerk who was paid for getting you any particular job or just for having you let off a fatigue; the gardener who sold fresh vegetables and fruit; the convict laboratory assistant who sold the results of analyses and even went so far as to manufacture phony consumptives, phony lepers and phony cases of enteritis; the men who specialized in stealing from the yards of the warders' houses and who sold eggs, chickens and soap; the houseboys who traded with the women they worked for and who brought anything they were asked to bring – butter, condensed milk, powdered milk, tins of tunny or sardines, cheese, and of course wine and spirits (in this way there was always a bottle of Ricard in our gourbi, as well as English and American cigarettes); and also those who were allowed to go fishing and who sold what they caught.

But the best racket, and the most dangerous, was keeping a gambling table. The rule was that there could never be more than three or four heads of table in each block of a hundred and twenty men. The man who wanted to take a table would turn up one night as the game began and say, 'I want a place as a banker.'

'No,' they would say.

'Everybody says no?'

'Everybody.'

'Well then, I name So-and-so: I'll take his place.'

The man whose name he said knew what had to be done. He would get up, walk to the middle of the room, and there they would fight it out with the knife. The winner took the table. The bankers had five per cent of all winnings.

Gambling provided the occasion for other little rackets or at least ways of earning money. There was the character who spread the smoothed blankets on the floor; the one who hired out small stools for the players who couldn't sit cross-legged; and the cigarette seller. He spread out several empty cigar boxes on a blanket, with cigarettes in them - French, English, American or even hand-made. Each had its price showing, and the card-player helped himself, scrupulously putting the money in the box. And then there was the man who looked after the paraffin lamps and saw to it they didn't smoke too much. These lamps were made out of condensed milk tins with a hole in the top for the wick, which had to be snuffed frequently. For the ones who didn't smoke, there were sweets and cakes - making them was a separate racket. And each block had one or two coffee sellers: they made their coffee in the Arab way, and kept it hot all night under two jute sacks. From time to time they would go up and down the room peddling coffee or chocolate kept hot in a kind of home-made haybox.

Then lastly there was the stuff they made to sell - the junk. This was a kind of handyman's racket. Some worked the tortoiseshell the fishermen brought in: the right sort of turtle's shell has thirteen scales, and they can weigh as much as five pounds apiece. Craftsmen turned them into bracelets, earrings, necklaces, cigarette-holders, combs and brush backs. I even saw a jewel box made of a blond tortoiseshell, a beautiful piece of work. Others carved coconut shells and cow or buffalo horn, or made snakes out of a local hard-wood or of ebony. Still others went in for very perfect cabinet-making, all put together without a single nail. The most skilful of the lot worked in bronze. And of course there were the painters.

Sometimes several craftsmen would combine to carry out a single project. For example, a fisherman would catch a shark. He'd prepare its jaws, wide open and with all the teeth properly arranged and brightly polished. Then a cabinet-maker would make a small-scale anchor out of a hard, cross-grained wood, wide enough in the middle for a painting. The anchor would be wedged into the open jaws, and a painter would paint the Iles du Salut with the sea all round. The most usual subject was this: the headland of Ile Royale, Saint-Joseph beyond and the strait between the two; the setting sun, with its rays spreading over the blue sea; on the water a boat, with six convicts, bare to the waist, standing and holding their oars straight up in the air; in the stern, three warders with sub-machine-guns. In the bows two men tilting a coffin with the body of a dead convict, swathed in flour sacks, sliding out of it: sharks on the surface, waiting open-mouthed for the corpse. In the bottom right-hand corner the words Funeral at Royale, and the date.

All these different kinds of junk were sold to the warders' houses. The finest pieces were often bought in advance or made to order. The others were sold on board the ships that touched at the islands. This was the boatmen's province. And then there were the jokers who'd take an old battered mug and engrave on it This mug belonged to Dreyfus - Ile du Diable and the date. And the same with spoons and bowls. There was a sure-fire piece of junk for the Breton sailors - anything at all that had the name Sczenac on it.

This non-stop racketing meant that a great deal of money came into the islands, and it was in the warders' interest to let it come. The men were completely absorbed in their schemes - they were easier to handle and they settled down in their new lives.

Homosexuality was officially recognized, or close on. Everybody, from the governor downwards, knew that So-and-so was So-and-so's wife, and if one was sent to another island the other was soon sent after him - if, indeed, they weren't sent together.

Out of all these men, there weren't three in a hundred who thought of escaping from the islands. Even those serving life sentences. The only way of setting about it was to use every possible means of being un-interned and sent to the mainland - to Saint-Laurent, Kourou or Cayenne. But this would only work for those with a set number of years. For the lifers, it was impossible except in the case of manslaughter: if you killed someone you were sent to Saint-Laurent to be tried. But to get there you had to confess; and that meant the risk of five years solitary for manslaughter, without any certainty of being able to use the short stay in the punishment block at Saint-Laurent - three months at the most - for an escape.

You could also try to be un-interned for health reasons. If you were certified tubercular they would send you to the place for consumptives called the Nouveau Camp, fifty miles from Saint-Laurent.

Leprosy would work too, or chronic enteritis with dysentery. It was fairly easy to get the certificate, but it involved running a hideous risk - that of living for close on two years in a special isolation wing with the patients suffering from the disease you had chosen. It was only a step between wanting to pass for a leper and actually catching the disease, or going in with lungs like a first-rate pair of bellows and coming out a consumptive: and the step was quite often made. As for dysentery, it was even harder to escape the infection.

So here I was, settling down in Block A with my hundred and twenty companions. I had to learn how to live in this society: it was one in which you were very quickly classified. In the first place everybody had to know you couldn't be shoved around. And then once you were feared you had to earn respect by the way you behaved with the screws, by never accepting certain jobs, by refusing certain fatigues, by never acknowledging the turnkeys' authority and by never obeying them, even if it meant a row with a warder. If you had been gambling all night, you mustn't even get up for the roll-call. The leader, or man in charge of the block, would call out, 'Sick: in bed.' In the two other blocks the warders would sometimes go in, have a look at the so-called invalid and make him come out for the roll-call. Never in the tough boys' block. When all was said and done, what they were all of them looking for, whether they were big or small, was a quiet life in this penal settlement.

My friend Grandet, my messmate, came from Marseilles. He was thirty-five, tall and as thin as a rail, but very strong indeed. We had been friends in France. We had gone around together at Toulon, as well as in Marseilles and Paris. He was a well-known safe breaker. He was good-natured, but he could be an exceedingly ugly customer.

This particular day I was almost alone in the huge room. The leader was sweeping and mopping the cement floor. I noticed a man busy repairing a watch, with one of those wooden things screwed into his left eye. Over his hammock there was a shelf with perhaps thirty watches hanging on it. His face was that of a man of thirty, but his hair was completely white. I went over, watched him working, and then tried to get into conversation with him. He never even looked up – remained silent. I went off, rather irritated, and walked out into the yard. I sat in the wash-house, and there I found Titi la Belote practising with a brand-new pack. His nimble fingers shuffled and reshuffled the thirty-two cards with incredible speed. His conjuror's hands went on without a pause, as he said to me, 'Well, brother, how are you getting along? You like it on Royale?'

'Yes, but today I'm fed up. I'm going to get myself a little job of some sort: that way I'll get out a bit. Just now I felt like having a natter with a guy that was mending a watch, and he wouldn't even answer.'

'You're telling me he didn't, Papi. That character doesn't give a fuck for anyone on God's earth. His watches, and the rest can go to hell. It's true he has the right to be mental, after what happened to him. It would certainly have driven me round the bend. Listen: this young chap – you can say young, because he's not thirty – was condemned to death last year for the so-called rape of a warder's wife. All genuine guaranteed crap. He'd been stuffing the woman he worked for, a Breton chief warder's certificated wife, time out of mind. He worked there as houseboy, so every time the Breton was on day-duty, the watchmaker stuffed the bird. But they made one error: the broad wouldn't let him wash and iron the clothes any more. She did it herself, and her cuckold of a husband, who knew she was bone-idle, found that very quaint indeed and began to have his doubts. But he had no proof of his horns. So he worked out a scheme to catch them actually at it and kill them both. He reckoned without the woman's presence of mind. One day he left duty two hours after having come on and he asked a warder to go back to his house with him, saying he'd give him a ham they'd sent him from his village. He walked in through the garden gate without making a sound, but the moment he opened the front door of the cottage a parrot started bawling out "Here's the boss!" as it always did when the screw came home. The same second the woman screeched, "Rape! Rape! Help, help!" The two screws came into the bedroom just as the woman disentangled herself from the convict: he jumped out of the window as the cuckold fired at him. He got the bullet in his shoulder and at the same time the broad scratched her tits and cheek and tore her dressing-gown. The watchmaker fell, and just as the Breton was going to finish him off the other screw took his gun away. I must tell you this other screw was a Corsican and right away he'd understood his chief's story was so much cock and it was no more a question of rape than it was of butter up her arse. But the Corsican couldn't very well open his mind to the Breton on the subject, so he behaved like he believed in the rape. The watchmaker was condemned to death. Well, brother, nothing surprising so far. It was afterwards it turned interesting.

'Now here on Royale, in the punishment block, there's a guillotine, with each part carefully put away in a special place. In the yard there are the five paving slabs they set it up on, all carefully cemented down and levelled. Every week the executioner and his assistants, a couple of convicts, set it up with its knife and all the other fixings, and they slice through two banana stems. That way, they know it's always working properly.

'So there was this Savoyard, the watchmaker, in a condemned cell with four others who were for it too - three Arabs and a Sicilian. All five were waiting for the result of the petition for reprieve their defending warders had put in.

'One morning the guillotine was set up and suddenly the Savoyard's door burst open. The executioners darted at him and hobbled his feet. Then they tied his hands with the same line, so it ran down to the hobble. They cut his collar open with scissors, and then with little hobbled steps in the dawn twilight he walked the twenty yards. As you know, Papillon, when you reach a guillotine, you are brought face to face with an upright plank, and they tie you to it with the straps fixed along the edge. So they strapped him on, and they were just going to swing him level, with his head over the edge for the knife, when Coco sec, the one who's governor now, turned up - he has to be present at all executions. He was carrying a big hurricane-lamp and the moment he lit up the scene he saw these bastards of screws had got it wrong – they were going to cut off the watchmaker's head, and that particular day, the watchmaker had just not been invited to the party.

"Stop! Stop!" shouts Barrot. He was so shook, it seems he couldn't speak properly. He dropped his hurricane-lamp, shoved them aside, screws and executioners, and undid the Savoyard himself. At last he managed to give some orders. "Take him back to his cell, orderly. Take care of him – give him some rum and stay with him. And you, you bloody fools, go and get hold of Rencasseu as quick as you like – he's the one that's being executed today and not anybody else!"

The next day the Savoyard's hair was snowy white, just like you saw it today. His defender, a screw from Calvi, wrote another petition to the minister of justice, telling him about what had happened. The watchmaker was pardoned and given life instead. Ever since, he's spent his time mending the screws' watches. That's his one passion. He goes on and on checking the time they keep; that's why there are so many hanging on his shelf. So now you understand the guy has a right to be a little old-fashioned, am I right or am I wrong?"

'Right, Titi: after something like that, he's certainly allowed to be what you might call unsociable. I'm genuinely sorry for him.'

Every day I learnt something more about this new kind of life. Block A did indeed contain a rich mixture of formidable men – formidable both where their past was concerned and in the way they behaved in everyday life. I was still not working: I was waiting for a cleaner's job that would leave me free to wander about the island after three quarters of an hour of work; and I should have the right to go fishing.

That morning, at the roll-call for the coconut planting fatigue, Jean Castelli's name was called. He stepped from the ranks and said, 'What's all this. You mean I'm being sent to work? Me?'

'Yes, you,' said the screw in charge of the fatigue. 'Here, take hold of this mattock.'

Castelli stared at him coldly. 'Man, get this: you have to come from some remote hole in the country to know how to handle this sort of an object. You have to be a provincial, like you. I'm a Marseilles Corsican. In Corsica we throw picks

'All the men who've been called out, strip! Quick march to the cells.' As the clothes came off so every now and then you heard the clash of a knife ringing on the macadam of the yard. At this moment the doctor appeared. 'Right. Halt! Here's the doctor. Doctor, please would you examine these men? Those who are not found to be sick, straight to the black-hole. The others can stay in their block.'

'Are there sixty reporting sick?'

'Yes, Doctor: all except for that man over there - he refused to work.'

'First man,' said the doctor. 'Grandet, what's wrong with you?'

'A stomach turned by gaolers, Doctor. We're all of us men sent down for long sentences and most of us for life, Doctor. No hope of escape on the islands. So we can only bear this life if there's a certain amount of give and take in the application of the rules. But this morning a warder went so far as to try and knock out a comrade we all think highly of - knock him out with a mattock handle there in front of us all. It wasn't in self-defence, because the man hadn't threatened anyone. All he'd said was he didn't want to use a mattock. That's the real reason for our epidemic. I leave it to you.'

The doctor bowed his head, thought for a good minute, and then said, 'Orderly, write this: "On account of a mass food-poisoning, medical warder So-and-so will take the necessary steps to purge the transportees who have reported sick today: he will give them each twenty grammes of sodium sulphate. As for transportee X, please have him placed under observation in the hospital so that we can judge whether he was in full possession of his faculties when he refused to work.'

He turned his back on the group and walked off.

'Everyone inside!' shouted the deputy governor. 'Pick up your things, and don't forget your knives.'

That day everybody stayed indoors. No one was allowed out, not even the man who fetched the bread. At about noon, instead of soup, the medical warder and two convict orderlies brought in a wooden pail full of sodium sulphate. Only three men were obliged to swallow the purge. The fourth fell on the pail in a wonderfully imitated epileptic fit, and flung the purge, the bucket and the spoon in every direction. With this the whole incident was closed, except that the block leader had the trouble of mopping up the mess.

I spent the afternoon talking to Jean Castelli. He had come to eat with us. He ordinarily messed with a man from Toulon, Louis Graven, who had been sent down for stealing furs. When I spoke to him of escaping, his eyes gleamed. He said, 'Last year I very nearly made a break, but it went sour on me. I was pretty sure you weren't the kind of man who would sit quietly here. The only thing is, you might as well talk Greek as talk about a break here on the islands. What's more, I see you haven't yet understood what kind of men they are, these island convicts. Ninety per cent of the characters you see are fairly happy here. No one will ever inform on you, whatever you do. You kill somebody, and there's never any witness; you steal - the same thing. Whatever a man may have done, the ranks close to protect him. There's only one thing the convicts on the islands are afraid of, and that is that a break should succeed. For if that happens, good-bye to their comparatively peaceful existence - continual searches, no card any more, no music - the instruments are smashed during the searches - no more chess or draughts, no more books, nothing. No junk, either. Everything, absolutely everything, done away with. Non-stop searches. Everything disappears sugar, oil, steak, butter, everything. Every time a man has made a break from the islands he's been picked up on the mainland, round about Kourou. But as far as the islands concerned, the break has succeeded - the guys have managed to get off the island. And so the screws are punished and they take it out of everybody else.'

I listened with all my ears. I was astonished - amazed - never seen the question in that light at all.

'The moral,' said Castelli, 'the moral is, that when you put your mind to escape, set about it with the utmost care. Before talking to a guy who's not a very close friend at all, think it over ten times.'

Jean Castelli was a professional burglar: he possessed unusual willpower and intelligence. He loathed violence; his nickname was l'Antique. For example, he would only wash with common soap; and if I washed with Palmolive he said, 'Lord, it smells of buggery here! You've been washing with tart's soap.' He was fifty-two, alas; but it was a pleasure to see his terrific energy. He said, 'Papillon, anyone would you were my son. Life here doesn't interest you. You eat well because you have to keep fit; but you'd never settle down to live your life here in the islands. I congratulate you. There are only half a dozen of us out of all the convicts who think that way. Above all, about escaping. Sure, there are quantities of men who'd pay a fortune to get themselves un-interned and so go to the mainland to make a break there. But here nobody believes in escaping.'

Old Castelli advised me to learn English and to talk Spanish with Spaniards whenever I could. He lent me a book to learn Spanish in twenty-four lessons. And a French-English dictionary. He was close friends with a Marseillais called Gardès, who knew a great deal about escaping. He had made two breaks himself. The first was from the Portuguese penal settlement; the second from the mainland. He had his own ideas about escaping from the islands: so had Castelli. Gravon, the Toulonnais, had his opinions too. None of these ideas coincided. From that day on, I made up my mind to take my own decisions and not to talk about escaping any more.

It was rough, but that was how it was. The only thing they agreed upon was that there was no sort of point in gambling except to make money; and that it was very dangerous. At any time you might be called upon to tackle any tough guy that challenged you to come out with a knife. They were all three men of action and for their age they were really terrific: Louis Gravon was forty-five and Gardès close on fifty.

Yesterday evening it so happened that I let almost every man in our block know my point of view and my idea of right behaviour. A little guy from Toulouse was challenged to fight - with knives of course - by a Nimois. The little guy from Toulouse was nicknamed Sardine and the big tough from Nimes, Mouton. 'Either you pay me twenty-five francs every poker game, or you don't play.'

Sardine said, 'Nobody's ever paid anybody anything for playing poker. Why pick on me? Why don't you go for the men at the Marseilles game?'

'That's none of your business. Either you pay or you don't play: or you fight.'

'No, I shan't fight.'

'You climb down, then?'

'Yes. Because I'm not going to risk getting a stab or being killed by a gorilla like you that's never gone off on a break.'

I'm here to make a break: I'm not here to kill or get myself killed.'

We were all tense to see what would happen. Grandet said to me, 'The little one is a good guy, that's for sure; and he's a right escaper. What a pity we can't say anything.'

I opened my knife and laid it under my thigh. I was sitting in Grandet's hammock.

'Well then, yellow-boy, are you going to pay or are you going to stop playing? Speak up.' He took a step towards Sardine.

Then I called out, 'You shut your bloody trap, Mouton, and leave the guy alone.'

'Are you crazy, Papillon?' said Grandet.

Still sitting there motionless with my open knife under my thigh and my hand on its hilt, I said, 'No, I'm not crazy, and you can all of you listen to what I've got to say. Mouton, before I fight with you, which I'll certainly do if you insist upon it even after you've heard my piece, just let me tell you and all the others that since I've been in this block, where there are more than a hundred of us, and all genuine crooks, I have been ashamed to see that the one right thing – the finest, most worthwhile, the one pure thing – the break, is not respected. Now any man who has proved he is a genuine escaper, any man with guts enough to risk his life in a break, ought to be respected by one and all, quite apart from anything else. Does any man contradict me?' Silence. 'You got laws all right, but you lack the most important one of all, the one that says everybody must not only respect an escaper but must also help him and back him up. Nobody's required to go off on a break and I quite admit it's reasonable most of you should make up your minds to live your lives here. But if you don't possess the spirit to try and make another life for yourselves, do at least pay the breakers the respect they deserve. If anyone forgets this natural law, let him expect serious consequences. And now, Mouton, if you still want a fight, let's go!' And I leapt into the middle of the room, knife in hand. Mouton threw his down and said, 'You're right, Papillon; so I won't fight you with a knife. But I will with fists, to show you I'm not yellow.'

I left my knife with Grandet. We went for one another like wild cats for about twenty minutes. At last, with a lucky butt, I just managed to win. We went off to the latrine together to wash the blood off our faces. Mouton said, 'You're right: we grow dull and stupid on the islands. Here I have been these fifteen years now, and I haven't even spent so much as a thousand francs on trying to get myself un-interned. It's shameful.'

When I went back to the gourbi Grandet and Galgani bawled me out. 'Are you mental, insulting everybody like that? It was a bleeding miracle no one jumped out into the alley to have a go at you with the knife.'

'No, brothers, there's nothing surprising about it. Every man belonging to our world admits it when somebody else is absolutely dead right.'

'Well, maybe so,' said Galgani. 'But you'd be wise not to arse about with dynamite too much.'

All that evening men came and spoke to me. They came over as if by chance and talked about just anything at all; then, before they went, they'd say, 'I agree with what you said, Papi.' This incident placed me exactly.

From that time on my companions certainly looked upon me as a man belonging to their world, but as one who would not bow to accepted notions without analysing them and arguing about them. I noticed that when I was the one in charge of the table there were fewer wrangles; and when I gave an order it was obeyed right away.

The head of the table, as I said, took five per cent on every winning bet. He sat on a bench with his back to the wall as a protection against murder - a possibility that was always there. A rug over his knees hid a wide-open knife. In a circle round him, thirty, forty, and even sometimes fifty gamblers from every part of France as well as many foreigners, including Arabs. The game was very simple. There was the banker and the cutter: every time the banker lost he passed the cards on to his neighbour. They played with fifty-two cards. The cutter cut the pack and left one card face down. The banker dealt a card face up on the blanket. Then the bets were made. They laid their money either on the cut or on the banker. When the bets were all in little heaps on the table, the cards were dealt one by one. Any card of the same value as one of the two on the table lost. For example, the cutter would have a queen hidden and the banker would have turned up a five. If a queen came up before a five, then the cut was the loser. If it was the other way about and a five came up, then it was the bank that lost. The head of the table had to know the amount of each stake and remember which was the cutter and which the banker so as to know which way the money was to go. This was not easy. You had to defend the weak against the strong, who were always trying to throw their weight about. When the head of the table made a decision in a tricky case, that decision had to be accepted without a murmur.

Last night an Italian named Carlino was murdered. He lived with a boy who acted as his wife. They both worked in a garden. He must have known his life was in danger, because when he slept the boy kept watch: and the other way about. They'd put empty tins under their hammock so that no one could slip under it without making a noise. And yet he was murdered, and from below. Immediately after his shriek there was a terrible clatter of tins as the killer scattered them.

Grandet was running the Marseilles game with more than thirty players all round him. I was standing near, talking. The shriek and the noise of the empty tins stopped the game. Everyone sprang up, asking what had happened. Carlino's boy-friend had seen nothing, and Carlino was no longer breathing. The block leader asked if he should tell the warders. No. It would be time to tell them tomorrow, at the roll-call: since he was dead, there was nothing to be done for him.

Grandet spoke up. 'Nobody heard anything. You didn't hear anything, either, boy,' he said to Carlino's friend. 'When they wake us tomorrow, you'll notice he's dead.'

And before you could say knife the game had begun again. As if nothing had happened the players went back to their cry of 'Cutter! No, banker!' etc.

I waited impatiently to see what would happen when the warders discovered there'd been a killing. Half past five, first bell. Six o'clock, second bell and coffee. Half past six, third bell and we went out for the roll-call in the usual way. But this time it was different. At the second bell the block leader said to the screw who came round with the coffee-man, 'Chief, a man's been killed.'

'Who?'

'Carlino.'

'OK.'

Ten minutes later six screws appeared. 'Where's the corpse?'

'Over there.' They saw the dagger driven into Carlino's back through the canvas. They pulled it out.

'Stretcher-bearers, take him away.' Two men carried him off. The sun rose. The third bell rang. Still holding the bloody knife, the head warder gave the order, 'Everyone outside, lined up for roll-call. No sick men allowed to stay in bed today.'

Everyone went outside. The governors and the chief warders were always there for the morning roll-call. The names were called. When they reached Carlino's, the block leader replied, 'Died during the night: has been taken to the morgue.'

'Right,' said the screw who was calling the roll.

When everybody had answered present, the head of the camp held up the knife and said, 'Does anyone recognize this knife?' Nobody replied. 'Did anyone see the murderer?' Dead silence. 'So as usual nobody knows anything at all. March past in front of me one by one with your hands stretched out: then each man to his work. It's always the same, Major: there's no way of finding out who did it.'

'Inquiry closed,' said the governor. 'Keep the knife: tie a label on stating it was the one used to kill Carlino.'

That was all. I went back indoors and I lay on my hammock to get a little sleep, for I had not had a wink all night. Just as I was going off I reflected that a convict didn't amount to much. Even if he was murdered in the most cowardly way, they wouldn't bother to find out who did it. As far as the administration was concerned a convict didn't count at all. Less than a dog.

I decided to begin work as a cesspitman on Monday. At half past four I'd go out with another man and empty the pots in Block A - our pots. The rules said you had to take them right down to the sea to empty them. But if he was paid, the buffalo-driver would wait for us on the plateau at a place where a narrow cemented channel ran down to the water. Then quickly, in less than twenty minutes, we emptied all the tubs into this channel and poured six hundred gallons of sea water to carry it all down. This sea water came in a huge barrel and we gave the driver, a pleasant Martinique Negro, twenty francs a go. We helped the whole lot on its way with a stiff broom. As this was my first day of work, carrying the tubs on their two wooden handles tired my wrists. But I soon got used to it.

My new mate was a very kindly, helpful type; yet Galgani told me he was an exceedingly dangerous man. It seemed he had committed seven murders on the islands. His own particular racket was selling shit. After all, every gardener had to have manure. For this, he would dig a pit, and put dried leaves and grass into it; then my black man would secretly take one or two tubs of the cess to the garden we pointed out to him. Of course, this could not be done alone, so I had to help him. But I knew it was very wrong, because by contaminating the vegetables it might spread dysentery not only among the warders but also among the convicts. I made up my mind that one day, when I knew him better, I'd stop him. Of course I'd pay him so that he wouldn't be a loser by giving up his racket. Apart from this, he also made ornaments out of horn. As far as fishing was concerned, he said he couldn't tell me anything; but down on the wharf Chapar or someone else might be able to help me.

So there I was - a cesspit man. Every day when work was over I had a good shower, put on a pair of shorts, and went fishing wherever I chose. There was only one thing I was required to do - be in the camp at noon. Thanks to Chapar I was well supplied with rods and hooks. When I went up the road carrying red mullet threaded through their gills on a wire, the warders' wives would often call out from their cottages. They all knew my name. 'Papillon, sell me five pounds of mullet.'

'Are you sick?'

'Have you got a sick child?'

'No.'

'Then I shan't sell you my fish.'

I made quite large catches and I gave them to friends in the camp. I swapped fish for long thin loaves, vegetables or fruit. In my gourbi we ate fish at least once a day. I was on my way up with a dozen big crayfish and about fifteen pounds of mullet one day, and as I passed in front of Major Barrot's house a rather fat woman said to me, 'You've had a good catch, Papillon. Yet the sea's rough and nobody else has caught any. It's at least a fortnight since I've eaten any fish. What a pity you don't sell them. My husband tells me you won't let the warders' wives buy any.'

'That's true, Madame. But maybe it's different with you.'

'Why?'

'Because you're fat, and perhaps meat is not good for you.'

'That's quite true. I've been told I should only eat vegetables and simply-prepared fish. But here it's not possible.'

'Here, Madame, take these crayfish and mullet.' And I gave her about five pounds of fish.

From that day on, every time I made a good catch, I gave her what was needed for a proper diet. She knew very well that on the islands everything was bought and sold, and yet she never said anything to me but 'Thank you.' She was right, because she sensed I would take it amiss if she offered me money. But she often asked me in. She herself would pour me out a pastis or a glass of white wine. If she was sent figatelli from Corsica, she gave me some. Madame Barrot never asked me a single question about my past. She only let out one thing, when we were speaking about the penal settlement one day - 'It's true you can't escape from the islands; but it's better to be here in a healthy climate than rotting on the mainland.'

It was she who told me about the origin of the name of these islands: once when there was an epidemic of yellow fever at Cayenne, the White Fathers and the nuns of a convent took refuge there and they were all saved. Hence the name Iles du Salut.

Thanks to my fishing, I could go everywhere. It was three months now that I had been cesspit man and I knew the island better than anyone. I went and looked at the gardens under the pretext of trading my fish for vegetables and fruit. The gardener of one that lay at the edge of the warders' graveyard was Matthieu Carbonieri: he belonged to my gourbi. He worked there by himself and it occurred to me that later on a raft could be made or buried in his garden. Two months more and the governor would be gone. I should be free to act.

I got things organized: I was officially the cesspit man and so I went out as if I were going about my work, but in fact it was the Martiniquais who did it for me - being paid for the trouble, of course. I began to make friends with two ~~brothers~~ in-law who were serving life sentences, Narric and ~~Quart~~. They were called the pram boys. I was told they'd been accused of turning a debt-collector they'd murdered ~~into a~~ of concrete. It was said that witnesses had seen ~~the~~ this block in a pram; and they were supposed to be ~~the~~

it into the Marne or the Seine. The investigation proved that the collector had gone to their place to get the money for a bill and that he'd never been seen since. They denied it all their lives long. Even in penal they swore they were innocent. But although the police never found the body, they did find the head, wrapped up in a handkerchief. Now in the brothers' house there were handkerchiefs that 'according to the experts' were of the same weave and the same thread. But they and their lawyers showed that thousands and thousands of yards of this same cloth had been turned into handkerchiefs. Everybody had them. In the end the two brothers-in-law got life and the wife of one, who was the sister of the other, got twenty years solitary.

I managed to get to know them well. They were builders, so they could go in and out of the Public Works yard. Maybe little by little they would be able to bring me out what was needed to make a raft. I'd have to persuade them.

Yesterday I met the doctor. I was carrying a forty-pound fish called a mérrou – very good eating. We walked up towards the plateau together. Half way we rested on a low wall. He told me you could make a delicious soup with a mérrou's head. I gave it to him, together with a big lump of its flesh. This astonished him, and he said, 'You're not one for bearing a grudge, Papillon.'

'Well, Doctor, this wasn't really for me. I owed it to you because you did everything you possibly could for my friend Clousiot.'

We talked for a while, and then he said, 'You really would like to escape, wouldn't you? You're not an ordinary convict. You give me the feeling of being quite a different sort of person.'

'You're right, Doctor. I don't belong in penal. I'm only here on a passing visit.'

He began to laugh, but then I tackled him: 'Doctor, do you believe a man can make himself a new life?'

'Why, yes.'

'Would you be prepared to say that I might live in society without being a danger to it, and that I might turn myself into a respectable member of the community?'

'I do sincerely believe that that is so.'

'Then why don't you help me bring it about?'

'How?'

'By getting me un-interned as a consumptive.'

Now he confirmed something I'd heard before. 'It's not possible, and I advise you never to do it. It's too dangerous. The Administration only un-interns a man for health reasons after he's spent at least a year in the wing set apart for that particular disease.'

'Why?'

'It's rather shameful, but I believe it's so that if the man in question is malingering, he shall know he's got a very fair chance of being genuinely infected by being in with the other patients, and indeed so that he may catch the disease. So I can't do anything for you.'

From that day on the medico and I were quite friendly. Up until the time he nearly killed my friend Carbonieri. Now Matthieu Carbonieri, in agreement with me, had accepted the job of cook-storekeeper in the head warders' mess. It was to see whether it would be possible, what with the wine, the oil and the vinegar, to steal three barrels that we could fix together in order to get out to sea. There were great difficulties, because in the course of the same night we'd have to steal the barrels, get them down to the sea without being heard or seen and lash them together with cables. The only chance would be a stormy night with wind and rain. But with wind and rain the hardest thing would be launching the raft into the sea, which would necessarily be very rough.

So Carbonieri was cook. The head of the mess gave him three rabbits to prepare for the next day, a Sunday. Luckily Carbonieri skinned them before sending one to his brother down on the wharf and two to us. Then he killed three fat cats and made a splendid dish.

Unfortunately for Carbonieri, the doctor was invited the next day, and as he was tasting the rabbit he said, 'Monsieur Filidori, I congratulate you on your cooking: this cat is delicious.'

'Don't you make game of me, Doctor: these are three fine plump rabbits we're eating.'

'No,' said the doctor, as obstinate as a mule. 'This is cat. Do you see these ribs I'm eating now? They're flat. Rabbits have rounded ribs. So there's no mistake possible: what we're eating is cat.'

'Almighty God in heaven, Cristachol!' cried the Corsican. 'There's cat in my stomach!' He tore into the kitchen, clapped his revolver to Matthieu's nose and said, 'You may be a Napoleonist like me, but I'm going to kill you for having made me eat cat.'

He was glaring like a maniac. Carbonieri couldn't understand how he knew: but he said, 'If you choose to call the things you gave me cats, that's not my fault.'

'I gave you rabbits, man.'

'Well, that's what I cooked. Look, the heads and skins are still here.'

The screw saw the rabbits' heads and skins and he was completely taken aback. 'So the doctor doesn't know what he's talking about?'

'Was it the doctor who said it?' asked Carbonieri, breathing once more. 'He's pulling your leg. Tell him that kind of joke's not funny.'

Quite happy, Filidori went back to the dining-room and said to the doctor, 'Talk away as much as you like, Doc. The wine has gone to your head. Round ribs or flat, I know it's rabbit I've been eating. I've just seen their three jackets and their three heads.' Matthieu had had a narrow squeak. Still, a few days later he thought it better to resign his post as a cook.

The time when I should be free to act was coming nearer. Only a few weeks now and Barrot would be off. Yesterday I went to see his fat wife, who, by the way, had grown much thinner on her diet of plain fish and vegetables. The kind woman asked me in to give me a bottle of Quinquina. The room was full of half-packed cabin trunks. They were getting ready to go. The major's wife said, 'Papillon, I don't know how to thank you for your kindness to me during these last months. I know that some days when you didn't catch many fish you gave me all you had. I thank you most sincerely. Thanks to you I feel very much better - I've lost thirty pounds. What can I do to show you my gratitude?'

'Something you'll find hard, Madame. I need a good compass. Accurate, but small.'

'What you're asking is not much, Papillon, and yet at the same time it's a great deal. And with only three weeks left, it's going to be difficult.'

A week before their departure, this great-hearted woman had still not been able to get hold of a good compass, so she took the boat and went to Cayenne. Four days later she was back with a magnificent antimagnetic compass.

Major Barrot and his wife left this morning. Yesterday he handed over the command to an official of the same rank, a man called Prouillet, who came from Tunisia. One piece of good news: the new governor had confirmed Dega in his place as chief accountant. This was very important for everybody, above all for me. The new governor addressed the body of convicts lined up in the main courtyard, and he gave the impression of being a very intelligent, very energetic man. Among other things, he said to us, 'From today I take over command of the Iles du Salut. Having observed that my predecessor's methods have produced positive results, I see no reason to alter the existing state of affairs. Unless your behaviour forces me to do so, there doesn't seem to me any necessity for changing your way of life.'

It was with a very understandable delight that I saw the major and his wife sail away, although these five months of obligatory waiting had passed with extraordinary speed. What with this false liberty almost all the convicts on the islands enjoyed, and the gambling, the fishing, the talk, the new acquaintances, the arguments and the fights, I had not had time to get bored – they were all very strong distractions.

Yet I'd not really let myself be entrapped by this atmosphere. Every time I made a new friend I wondered, 'Might he be the man for a break? Even if he doesn't want to escape, might he help another man to do so?'

That's all I lived for – escape, escape, by myself or with others: but in any case to escape, to have it away, to make a break. It was an obsession: following Jean Castelli's advice I never talked about it, but it haunted me. And I'd accomplish my ideal without weakening: I'd break out and away.

in a Grave

At the end of five months I'd come to know every nook and corner of the island. At present it seemed to me that the best chance for making a raft was the garden my friend Carbonieri had near the graveyard – he was no longer there. So I asked him to take his garden back but with nobody to help him. He agreed. Thanks to Dega he was given it.

As I was passing by the new governor's house this morning with a fine catch of red mullet hanging on my wire I heard a convict houseboy tell a young woman, 'Madame, there's the man who used to bring Madame Barrot fish every day.' And then I heard the good-looking, dark, sunburnt woman – rather the Algerian type – say to him, 'So that's Papillon?' And calling out to me she said, 'I've had delicious crayfish caught by you at Madame Barrot's. Come in. I'm sure you'd like a glass of wine and a little of the goat cheese I've just received from France.'

'No thank you, Madame.'

'Why not? You came all right for Madame Barrot, so why not for me?'

'Because her husband said I could.'

'Listen, Papillon: my husband's in command of the camp, and I'm in command of the house. Walk in and don't be afraid.' I felt that this self-willed, pretty woman might either be useful or dangerous. I walked in.

In the dining-room she gave me some smoked ham and some cheese. Without any ceremony she sat down opposite me and poured me out wine, then some coffee and excellent Jamaican rum. 'Papillon,' she said, 'in spite of all the fuss of her going and us arriving, Madame Barrot had time to tell me about you. I know she was the only woman on the islands who had from you. I hope you'll do me the same favour.'

'That was because she was ill; but as far as I can see, you're perfectly fit.'

'I can't lie, Papillon. Yes, I'm quite well, but I come from a seaport and I just love fish. I'm from Oran. There's only one thing that worries me - I also know you don't sell your fish. That really is awkward.'

To cut it short, we agreed that I should bring her fish. I was just smoking a cigarette, having given her a good seven pounds of mullet and six langoustines, when the governor appeared.

He saw me and said, 'Juliette, I've told you that apart from the houseboy no transportee is to come into the house.'

I stood up, but she said, 'Sit down. This transportee is the man Madame Barrot told me about before she left. So it's nothing to do with you. No one will come in except for him. Besides, he's going to bring me fish whenever I need it.'

'All right,' said the governor. 'What's your name?'

I was going to stand up to reply when Juliette put her hand on my shoulder and made me sit down again. 'This is my house,' she said. 'The governor's not the governor here: he's my husband, Monsieur Prouillet.'

'Thank you, Madame. My name's Papillon.'

'Ha! I've heard about you and your escape from the hospital at Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni three years ago and more. And it so happens that one of the warders you stunned was none other than our nephew.' At this Juliette laughed - fresh, young laughter - and said, 'So you're the one who knocked Gaston out? That won't change our relations in the least.'

The governor was still standing: he said to me, 'The number of killings and murders committed every year on the islands is unbelievable. Many more than on the mainland. How do you account for this, Papillon?'

'Why, Governor, here the men can't escape, so they're full of ill-temper. They live on top of one another for years on end, and it's natural their friendships and enmities should be very, very strong. Besides, less than five per cent of the man-slaughters or murders are solved, so the killer is pretty well sure of getting away with it.'

'That's a reasonable explanation. Since when have you been fishing, and what job do you do so that you can fish?'

'I'm a cesspitman. I finish my work by six in the morning, and that allows me to go off with my rod.'

'All the rest of the day?' asked Juliette.

'No. I have to be back in camp at noon, and then I'm allowed out again from three to six. It's a nuisance, be-

'Eight.'

'Then you take your eight and give the rest to the houseboy to put in the refrigerator.'

I didn't know what to say. She'd never said tu to me before, above all not in front of another woman who was certainly going to talk about it. I was about to go, feeling horribly awkward, when she said, 'Sit still: stay where you are and have a pastis. You must be hot.'

I was so taken aback by her authoritarian attitude I sat down. Slowly I drank my pastis, smoking and watching the young woman who was combing the governor's wife's hair, glancing at me from time to time as she did so. The governor's wife had a glass in her hand and she noticed this. She said, 'My boy-friend's handsome, isn't he, Simone? All you other women are jealous of me, aren't you?' And they giggled together. I didn't know which way to look. Stupidly I blurted out, 'Fortunately your boy-friend, as you call him, can't be very dangerous: the position he's in, he can't be anyone's boy-friend.'

'You're not going to tell me you don't want to be my boy-friend,' said Juliette. 'You're one of these lions nobody's been able to tame, and yet I can twist you round my little finger. There must be some reason for that, don't you think, Simone?'

'I don't know what reason there can be,' said Simone. 'But you're a proper old bear for everybody except the governor's wife, Papillon, and that's a fact. Such a bear that the chief warder's wife told me that last week when you were going by with more than thirty pounds of fish you wouldn't let her have the two miserable objects she so longed for, there being no meat at the butcher's.'

'Ha, ha! That's a new one to me, Simone!' said Juliette.

'Do you know what he said to Madame Kargueret the other day?' went on Simone. 'She saw him going along with some langoustines and a great big moray eel. "Sell me that moray, Papillon, or at least half of it," she says. "You know we Bretons cook moray very well." "It's not only the Bretons that appreciate it," says he. "Plenty of people, including those from the Ardèche, have known it was a prime dish since the days of the Romans." And he walked on without selling her anything at all.' They laughed and laughed.

I went back to the camp in a rage and that evening I told the gourbi the whole story. 'It's very serious,' said that had supposedly been cleared up by me, I had Boursset right there in my pocket, where I wanted him to be – he trusted me absolutely. For the first time in his life as a convict he could breathe easy. At this point I decided to risk it.

One evening I said to him, 'I've got two thousand francs for you if you'll make the thing I want – a raft big enough for two, in sections that'll fit together.'

'Listen, Papillon, there's no one else I'd do that for. But for you I'm ready to run the risk of two years solitary if I'm caught. There's only one snag – I can't take wood of any size out of the yard.'

'I've got someone who can.'

'Who?'

'The pram boys, Naric and Quenier. How are you going to set about it?'

'We must draw a scale plan to begin with and then make the pieces one by one, with mortises so that everything'll fit together perfectly. The difficulty will be to find wood that floats, because here on the islands everything's hardwood and sinks.'

'When can you let me know?'

'In three days.'

'Would you like to go with me?'

'No.'

'Why not?'

'I'm afraid of the sharks and of drowning.'

'Will you promise to help me right through to the end?'

'I swear it on the heads of my children. The only thing is it's going to take a long time.'

'Listen carefully: this very day I'll set you up a defence in case of anything going wrong. I'll copy the plan of the raft on exercise-book paper myself. Underneath I'll write, Boursset, if you don't want to be murdered, just you make the raft shown above. Later on I'll give you written orders for the making of each section. When each one is finished, you'll put it in a certain place. It'll be taken away. Don't try to find out who by or when' (this idea seemed to relieve his mind). 'In this way I prevent you being tortured if you're taken, and you only risk six months at the most.'

'And what if you're the one that's caught?'

'In that case it'll be the other way around. I'll admit I wrote the notes. You've got to keep these written orders, of course. Is it a deal?'

'Yes.'

'You're not frightened?'

'No, I'm not afraid any more; it'll make me happy to help you.'

I did not tell anyone. I was waiting for Bourset's definitive answer first. It was not until a tedious, endless week had gone by that I was able to talk to him alone, in the library. There was no one else there. It was a Sunday morning. In the yard, under the wash-house, the gambling was in full swing. Close on eighty players and the same number of men watching.

Straight away he filled my heart with sunshine. 'The hardest thing was to make sure of having enough light, dry wood. I got round that by thinking up a kind of wooden frame to be filled with dry coconuts - the nuts still in their husks, of course. There's nothing lighter than that fibre, and the water can't get into it. When the raft's ready, it'll be up to you to get enough coconuts to fill it. So tomorrow I'll start on the first section. It'll take me about three days. Any time after Thursday one of the pram boys can take it away during the first lull. I'll never begin another piece before the last has left the yard. Here's the plan I made: you copy it and write me the letter you promised. Have you spoken to the pram boys?'

'No, not yet: I was waiting for your answer.'

'Well, now you've had it. It's yes.'

'Thanks, Bourset. I don't know how to thank you. Look, here's five hundred francs.'

Looking me straight in the eye, he said, 'No, keep your money. If you get to the mainland you'll need it for the next part of the break. From today on I shan't gamble until you've gone. I can always make enough with a few little jobs to earn my cigarettes and my steak.'

'Why won't you take it?'

'Because I wouldn't do this even for ten thousand francs. The risk is too great, even with all your precautions. But for free, that's something else again. You've helped me: you've been the only one to stand up for me. Although I'm frightened, I'm still happy to help you to be free again.'

As I sat there, copying the plan on a sheet torn from an exercise-book, Bourset's simple, direct greatness of heart filled me with shame. It had never even occurred to him that his behaviour might have been calculated or insincere. To risk little in my own esteem, I had to tell myself that I had to escape, at any cost at all, even if necessary at the price of trickery and not always very pretty situations. That night I spoke to Naric, whom they called Bonne Bouille, and who was to tell his brother-in-law later. Without any hesitation he said, 'You can rely on me to get the sections out of the yard for you. Only don't be in too much of a hurry, because we can only get them out when we're taking a good deal of stuff for some building job on the island. In any case, I promise we'll not let any chance slip by.'

Good. Now I only had to talk to Matthieu Carbonieri, for he was the man I wanted to make the break with. He agreed one hundred per cent.

'Matthieu, I've found a man who'll make me the raft: I've found a man who'll get the sections out of the yard for me. It's up to you to find a place in your garden to bury it in.'

'No, a kitchen-garden would be too dangerous, because there are screws that go stealing vegetables at night, and if they were to walk on the bed and notice it was hollow underneath, we'd have had it. I'll hollow out a place in a retaining wall - I'll take out a big stone and make a kind of little cave. That way, when a section comes along, I'll only have to lift the stone, hide the wood, and put it back again.'

'Should the sections be taken straight to your garden?'

'No, that would be too risky. The pram boys couldn't say what they were doing in my garden. The best thing is to work out a scheme for them to leave each piece in some different place, not too far from the garden.'

'Right.'

Everything seemed to be running smoothly. There were still the coconuts. I'd have to find out how I could get a sufficient number together without drawing attention to myself.

And now I began to feel as if I were coming to life again. All there was left to do was to speak to Galgani and Grandet. I had no right to keep quiet, because they might be accused of complicity. The normal thing would be to make an open breach with them and go and live by myself. When I told them I was going to make preparations for an escape and so I ought to live apart from them, they bawled me out and flatly refused. 'You go off as soon as ever you can. As for us, we'll manage. Meanwhile, stay with us - we can cope, all right.'

It was a month now that plans for the break had been on the go. I'd already received seven pieces of the raft, two of them big ones. I'd been to see the retaining wall in which Matthieu had hollowed out the hiding-place. You couldn't see the stone had been moved, because he'd taken care to put moss all round it. The hiding-place was perfect, but the hollow seemed to me too small to hold everything. Still, it was big enough for the moment.

The fact that I was getting ready for a break put me in terrific spirits. I was eating better than I'd ever eaten before, and fishing kept me wonderfully fit. On top of that, I did more than two hours of physical training on the rocks every morning. It was my legs I concentrated on, because fishing already looked after my arms. I discovered a splendid exercise for my legs: I waded in deeper than I would for ordinary fishing and the waves came breaking against my thighs. To withstand their force I kept all my muscles taut. The result was excellent.

Juliette, the governor's wife, was still very pleasant with me, but she'd noticed that I only went to her house when her husband was there. She told me so frankly, and to make me easy in my mind she said she had only been joking, that day when her hair was being done. Still, the young woman who had acted as hairdresser watched for me often enough when I was coming back from fishing, and she always had something kind to say – was I well? How was I getting along? So everything was fine. Bourset never lost a chance to make me a section. It was two and a half months now since we had begun.

The hiding-place was full, as I had foreseen. There were only two sections to come now, the longest ones – the first over six feet and the other about five. These sections would not be able to get into the hiding-place.

I noticed a fresh grave over in the cemetery: it belonged to the wife of one of the warders – she had died last week. A miserable withered bunch of flowers lay upon it. The keeper of the graveyard was an old, half-blind convict they called Papa. He spent all day sitting in the shade of a coconut palm in the opposite corner of the cemetery, and from where he was, he couldn't see the grave nor if anyone was going towards it. So I had the idea of making use of this grave for putting the raft together and filling the frame with as many coconuts as possible. Between thirty and thirty-four – many fewer than we had thought. I had more than fifty stored in different places.

In Juliette's yard alone there were twelve. The houseboy thought I'd left them there meaning to extract the oil one day.

When I heard that the dead woman's husband had left for the mainland, I made up my mind to scoop out some of the earth from the tomb, going down as far as the coffin.

Sitting there on his wall, Matthieu Carbonieri kept watch. He had a white handkerchief on his head, tied at the four corners. Just by him, there was another handkerchief, also tied at the corners, but red this time. So long as there was no danger, he kept the white one on. If anyone appeared, whoever it might be, Matthieu put on the red handkerchief.

This very dangerous work took me one afternoon and one night: no more. I had to widen the hole to the breadth of the raft — four feet plus a little room for play — so it was not necessary to take the earth away as far down as the coffin. The hours seemed endless, and the red handkerchief appeared several times. At last this morning it was finished. The hole was covered over with plaited palm fronds, making a fairly solid kind of floor. Earth scattered over the whole, with a little border. It could scarcely be seen. I was at the very end of my tether.

It was three months now that the preparations for this break had been going on. We had taken all the sections, numbered and assembled, out of the hiding-place and now they lay upon the good lady's coffin, well hidden by the earth which covered the mats. In the place in the wall we put three flour-sacks and two yards of rope for the sail, a bottle full of matches and strikers, and a dozen tins of milk: that was all.

Boursset grew more and more worked up. You would have thought it was him who was going rather than me. Naric was sorry now that he had not said yes to begin with. We'd have worked on a raft for three rather than two.

It was the rainy season and rain fell every day; this was an advantage when I went to the hiding-place, where I had almost finished setting up the raft. The only parts unfixed were two side pieces in the frame. I had brought all the coconuts nearer and nearer to my friend's garden. They were in an open buffalo-stable, where they could be taken easily and without risk. My friends never asked what stage I had reached. From time to time they'd just say, 'OK?' 'Yes, fine.' 'Waiting rather a long time, isn't it?' 'We can't go faster than its being too risky.' That was all. When I was asked what the coconuts I had stored at Juliette's she saw me and gave me a most horrible fright.

'Why, Papillon, so you're going to make that coconut oil. Why don't you do it here in the yard? There's a mallet here to open them with and I'll lend you a big saucepan.'

'I'd rather do it at the camp.'

'How odd: it can't be very convenient there.' She thought for a moment and then said, 'Do you know what? I don't believe you're going to make coconut oil at all.' My blood ran cold. She went on, 'In the first place, what would you do with it, since you can get all the olive oil you want from me? Those nuts are for something else, aren't they?'

The sweat was dripping off me: right from the start I'd been expecting the word escape. My breath came short. I said, 'Madame, it's a secret; but as you are so curious - you want to know about it so much that you'll spoil the surprise. All I'll tell you is that these big nuts were chosen so that I could make you something really pretty out of the shells. That's the truth of it.'

I'd won, for she replied, 'Papillon, don't put yourself out for me: and I absolutely forbid you to spend any money on making me anything. I'm truly grateful, I really am, but I ask you not to do it.'

'All right: we'll see.' Relief, relief. Straight away I asked her to give me a pastis, which was something I never did. Luckily, she didn't notice my shattered state. The Lord was with me.

It rained every day, particularly in the afternoon and at night. I was afraid the water would wash away the sprinkling of earth and uncover the palm-frond mats. Matthieu continually kept replacing the earth that was carried away. Underneath, everything must be quite soaked. With Matthieu's help I pulled the mats off - the water was almost over the top of the coffin. Things were growing critical. Not far away there was a vault with two children who had died long ago. One day we forced off the cover: I got in and with a short crowbar I set about the cement, going to work as low as possible on the side where the grave with the raft was. Once I was through the cement, I had hardly driven the bar any distance into the earth before a great jet shot in. It was the water from the grave pouring into the vault. I came out when it reached my knees. We put the slab back and ran the white putty Naric had given me round the edge. This operation drained off half the water in our grave-hiding-place. That evening Carbonieri said, 'There'll never be an end to the things that go wrong with this break.'

'We're almost there, Matthieu.'

'Almost: let's hope so. We were both on hot bricks – very hot bricks.'

That morning I went down to the harbour. I asked Chapar to buy me five pounds of fish – I'd come and fetch it at noon. Right. I went up again to Carbonieri's garden. As I got nearer I saw three white caps. Why three screws in the garden? Were they making a search? It wasn't usual. I'd never seen three screws all at once at Carbonieri's place. I waited for more than an hour and then I couldn't bear it any longer. I made up my mind to push on and see what was happening. Quite openly I walked up the path leading to the garden. The screws watched me coming. When I was about twenty yards from them I was exceedingly interested to see Matthieu putting on his white handkerchief. I could breathe easy now, and I had time to collect myself before I reached them.

'Good morning, Messieurs les Surveillants. Good morning, Matthieu. I've come for the pawpaw you promised me.'

'I'm sorry, Papillon, but it was stolen this morning when I went to get sticks for my runner beans. But there'll be some others ripe in four or five days; they are beginning to turn yellow already. Well, now, warders, wouldn't you like a few lettuces and tomatoes and radishes for your wives?'

'Your garden's very well kept, Carbonieri,' said one of them. 'I congratulate you.'

They took the tomatoes, lettuces and radishes, and went off. I left ostentatiously some little time before them, carrying two lettuces. I went by the graveyard. The rain had washed half the earth off the grave. Ten yards off I could see the mats. If we hadn't been discovered, the Lord really was with us.

Every night the wind blew like fury, howling madly and roaring over the plateau; and often it brought rain with it. Let's hope it would last. It was the ideal time for getting away but not for the grave.

The biggest piece of wood, the six-footer, had been delivered safely. It had gone to join the other sections of the mat – even placed it: it fitted into the mortises exactly, to the breadth, without any force. Bourset ran all the way to camp to find out whether I had received it – the long one.

wood was of the very first importance, but it was most uncommonly awkward and bulky. He was delighted to know that everything had passed off well. You would have thought he wasn't sure of its getting there. I questioned him. 'Were you in doubt? Do you think someone knows what's up? Have you told anyone in private? Tell me.'

'No. Absolutely no.'

'Yet it seems to me something's worrying you. Tell.'

'I had a nasty feeling because of the way a guy called Bébert Celier watched – curiously interested, he was. I felt he'd seen Naric take the piece of wood from under the workbench, put it in the lime barrel and then carry it off. He watched Naric as far as the gate of the yard. The brothers were going to white-wash a building. That's why I was worried.'

I said to Grandet, 'This Bébert Celier is in our block: so he's not an informer.'

He said, 'That man goes in and out of the Public Works as he likes. It's quite obvious the sort of guy he is – penal battalion, one of those bad bargains of the Army who's been through all the military prisons of Algeria and Morocco, quarrelsome, dangerous with a knife, red-hot after boys, and a gambler. He's never had any life as a civilian. In a word – no bloody good and extremely dangerous. Prison is his life. If you feel suspicious, get in first – kill him tonight, and then if he means to shop you, he won't have time for it.'

'There's nothing to prove he's an informer.'

'That's true,' said Galgani. 'But there's nothing to prove he's a decent type, either. Convicts of that kind don't like breaks, as you know. Breaks upset their quiet little well-organized lives. There's nothing else on earth they'd inform about, but for a break – who can tell?'

I asked Matthieu Carbonieri's advice. He was in favour of killing him that night. He wanted to do it himself. I was fool enough to stop him. I hated the idea of killing someone on mere appearances, or letting him be killed. What if Bourset had only imagined it all? Fear might have made him see things that weren't there. I questioned Naric. 'Bonne Bouille, did you notice anything about Bébert Celier?'

'No: I didn't. I carried the barrel out on my shoulder so the turnkey on the gate shouldn't see into it. We'd agreed I should stand there just in front of him, without putting the barrel down, and wait for my brother to catch me up. That was so the Arab should see I was in no hurry, and not bother to look into the barrel. But afterwards my brother told me that he thought he saw Bébert Celier watching us closely.'

'What do you think yourself?'

'I think my brother was on edge because this piece is so big and because you can see straight away it's meant for a raft: and he was afraid, too. He thought he saw more than he really did see.'

'That's what I think too. Let's leave it at that. For the last section, find out just where Bébert Celier is before you make a move. Take the same precautions with him as you would for a screw.'

All that night I played the Marseilles game like crazy. I won seven thousand francs. The wilder I played the more I won. At half past four I went out for my so-called fatigue. I let the Martiniquais do my work. The rain had stopped and I went, though it was still quite dark, to the graveyard. I couldn't find the spade, but I scuffed the earth over the grave with my feet: this did the job fairly well. By seven o'clock, when I went down to go fishing, a splendid sun was already shining. I went in the direction of the southern tip of Royale, the place where I meant to launch the raft. A rough cross-sea was running. I couldn't be sure, but I had the feeling that it was not going to be so easy to get away from the islands without being picked up by a wave and flung on to the rocks. I began fishing and straight away I caught a great many mullet. In no time at all I had over ten pounds. When I'd cleaned them in sea water I stopped. I was uneasy in my mind and tired after that night of wild gambling. I rested, sitting in the shade of a rock, and I told myself that this tension I'd been living in for three months and more was reaching its end: and when I reflected on this business of Celier, I once more came to the conclusion that I had no right to kill him.

I went to see Matthieu. You could see the grave very well from his garden wall. Earth had drifted along the path. Carbonieri was going to go and sweep it off at midday. I called in at Juliette's and gave her half my fish. She said, 'Papillon, I had a bad dream about you: I saw you covered with blood and then chained up. Don't do anything stupid - if anything were to happen to you I'd suffer dreadfully. That dream ...'

set me so, I've neither washed nor done my hair. I took the binoculars and tried to see where you were fishing, but I couldn't find you. Where did you catch these?

'The other side of the island. That's why you didn't see me.'

'Why do you go and fish so far away, where I can't see you even with the binoculars? What if you were swept off by a wave? There'd be no one to see you or help you escape from the sharks.'

'Oh come, don't exaggerate.'

'You think that's exaggerating? I forbid you to go fishing on the other side of the island, and if you don't obey, I'll have your pass taken away from you.'

'Let's be reasonable, Madame. To please you, I'll let your houseboy know where I'm going to fish.'

'All right. But you look tired.'

'Yes, Madame. I'm on my way up to the camp to lie down.'

'Very well. I'll expect you at four o'clock for a cup of coffee. You'll come?'

'All right, Madame. I'll be seeing you.'

This dream of Juliette's was just the very thing to make me feel perfectly calm, of course! As if I hadn't enough solid difficulties, dreams had to be added to make up the weight.

Bourset said he really did feel he was being watched. It was a fortnight now that we had been waiting for the last four-foot section. Naric and Quenier said they noticed nothing out of the way, but still Bourset would keep holding up the work on this plank. If it hadn't been for the five mortises that had to fit exactly, Matthieu would have made it in the garden: but these slots had to take all five ribs. Naric and Quenier were repairing the chapel, and so they could move a good deal of stuff in and out of the yard quite easily. Even more, they sometimes had the use of a cart pulled by a little buffalo. This was something we just had to take advantage of.

Urged on by us, Bourset made the piece, but against his better judgment. One day he said he was sure that when he wasn't there someone moved the plank and then put it back. There was still one mortise to be cut at the far end. We decided he should make it and then hide the wood under the top of his workbench. He was to lay a hair on it to see whether anyone touched it. He cut the mortise and at six o'clock he left the workshop, the last man to go - he had checked to see that there was no one there except for the screw. The section was there in its place, with the hair over it. At noon I was at the camp, waiting for the building yard men, eighty of them, to turn up. Naric and Quenier were there, but not Bourset. A German came up to me and gave me a carefully closed, stuck-down note. I could see it hadn't been opened. It read, 'The hair's no longer there, so someone has touched the section. I've asked the screw to let me stay during the siesta to finish the little rosewood chest I'm working on. I'm going to take the section and put it with Naric's tools. Tell them. At three o'clock they must take it out of the yard at once. Maybe we can move faster than the bastard who's watching.'

Naric and Quenier agreed. They would get into the front rank of the building yard workmen. Just before the column went in, two men would have a fight some way outside the gate. We asked a couple of Carbonieri's countrymen to do us this favour - two Montmartre Corsicans, Massani and Santini. They didn't ask for any reason: quite the right way to behave. Naric and Quenier were to take advantage of this to hurry out with building material, as though they wanted to get to their work fast and the quarrel didn't interest them. We all thought we still had a chance. If we brought it off, then I wouldn't stir for a month or two, because it was quite certain that at least one man if not more knew a raft was being prepared. It was up to them to find out who was doing it, and where the hiding-place was.

At last half past two came round and the men began to get ready. It took thirty minutes from the roll-call to marching off to work. They set out. Bébert Celier was in the middle of the column of eighty men marching in fours.

Naric and Quenier were in the front rank; Massani and Santini in the twelfth; Bébert Celier in the tenth. It seemed to me a good arrangement, because when Naric got hold of his material and scaffolding and the piece of raft, a good deal of the column wouldn't yet be inside. Bébert would be nearly at the gate or perhaps some way short of it. As the Corsicans were going to roar at one another like a couple of maniacs everyone, including Bébert, would naturally turn round to see what was going on.

Four o'clock. Everything had gone off perfectly and the section was lying under a heap of builder's material in the church. They hadn't been able to take it further, but it was perfect there.

I went to see Juliette. She wasn't at home. Going up again, I passed the administration block. Massani and Jean Santini were standing there in the shade, waiting to be taken to the punishment cells. Everyone had known that was bound to happen. I went by close to them and said, 'How long?'

'A week,' replied Santini.

A Corsican screw said, 'What a bleeding shame to see men from the same country fighting one another.'

I went back to the camp. Six o'clock: Bourset came back delighted. He said, 'It was as if I'd had cancer and then the doctor told me he'd got it wrong - there was nothing the matter with me.' Carbonieri and my other friends exulted and they congratulated me on the way I'd organized the scheme. Naric and Quenier were pleased, too. Everything was fine. I slept all through that night, although in the evening the gamblers came and asked me to join their game. I pretended to have a bad headache. I was in fact dying on my feet; but I was satisfied, and I was happy at being on the very edge of success. The hardest part was over.

This morning Matthieu put the section in the hollow of the wall just for the time being, because the man who looked after the graveyard was sweeping the paths over by the tomb hiding-place. It wouldn't be wise to go to it at present. At dawn every morning I hurried there with a wooden shovel and tidied the earth on the grave. I swept the path and then, still at the double, I went back to my pot-emptying, leaving the shovel and the broom in a corner belonging to my job.

It was four months to the day since the preparations for the break had begun and nine days since we had at last received the final section of the raft. Now the rain was no longer falling every day and sometimes all night long too. All my senses were on the stretch for the two D-days - the first when this last piece was to be taken out of Matthieu's garden and fixed in its place on the raft, holding all the ribs. This was something that could only be done in daylight. And the second D-day would be that of our escape. It could not be directly after the first, because once the raft was taken out, the coconuts and the stores still had to be fitted into it.

Yesterday I told Jean Castelli all about it: and I told him just what point I'd reached. He was happy for me that I was so near my goal. He said, 'The moon's in its first quarter.'

'I know; and so it won't worry us at midnight. Low tide's at ten, and therefore the right moment for the launch will be two in the morning.'

Carbonieri and I had decided to hurry things. Tomorrow morning at nine, the last section to be fitted. And the same night, the break.

The next morning, having carefully planned our movements, I went from the garden to the graveyard and I jumped over the wall with a spade. While I was scooping the earth from over the plaited fronds, Matthieu raised his stone and brought me the last section. Together we lifted off the mats and put them to one side. There was the raft, perfectly preserved. A little earth sticking to it, but perfectly sound. We lifted it out, because we needed side-room to fit the last section. We settled the five ribs in their places: to get them right home we had to hammer them with a stone. Just as we had finished and were in the act of putting it back, we looked up and saw a warder, holding a gun.

'Don't move, or you're dead men!'

We dropped the raft and raised our hands. I recognized the screw: he was the building yard chief warder.

'Don't be such bloody fools as to resist. You're caught. Give in and maybe you'll save your skins at least: but I feel so like filling you full of lead it's not all that sure. On your way, now: keeping your hands right up in the air. Get along to the administration block.'

As we went past the cemetery gate we met an Arab turnkey. The screw said, 'Mohamed, thanks for this bit of work. Come and see me tomorrow morning and I'll give you what I promised.'

'Thanks,' said the Arab. 'I'll come for sure. But chief, Bébert Celier has to pay me too, doesn't he?'

'You fix that with him yourself,' said the screw.

Then I said, 'So it was Bébert Celier that shopped us, Chief?'

'It's not me that said so.'

'That's all one. I just like to know.'

Still covering us with his rifle, the screw said, 'Mohamed, search them.'

The Arab took the knife out of my belt; and he found Matthieu's. I said, 'You're a sharp lad, Mohamed. How did you find out?'

'I climbed up a coconut palm every day to see where you were hiding the raft.'

“Who told you to do that?”
“It was Bébert Celier first, then Monsieur Bruet, the warder.”
“Too much chat,” said the screw. “Get going. You can lower your hands now, and walk quicker.”
“The four hundred yards we had to cover to reach the administration block seemed to me the longest road I’d ever travelled in all my life. I was utterly crushed. All that effort just to be caught like a couple of twits. God, how cruel. You come to me!”

Our arrival at the block made quite a stir. For going along we had met other warders, and they had joined the first, who was still covering us with his rifle. By the time we got there we had seven or eight screws behind us.

The governor had been told by the Arab, who had run ahead, and he was there on the steps of the administration block, together with Dega and five head warders.

“What’s happened, Monsieur Bruet?” asked the governor.
“What’s happened is that I’ve caught these two men red-handed, busy hiding a raft—a finished raft, I think.”

“What have you to say, Papillon?”
“Nothing. I’ll talk at the inquiry.”

“Put them in the black-hole.”
I was put into a black-hole whose bunged-up window gave on to the entrance by the governor’s office. The cell was dark, but I could hear people talking in the street leading to the block.

Things moved fast. At three o’clock we were brought out and handcuffed. A kind of court was sitting there in the big room: governor, deputy-governor, chief warder. Dega, sitting to one side at a little table, was obviously there to take the statements as they were made.

“Charrière and Carbonieri, listen to Monsieur Bruet’s report concerning you. “I, Bruet Auguste, head warder in charge of the building yard on the Îles du Salut, accuse two convicts Charrière and Carbonieri of theft and misappropriation of material belonging to the State. I accuse joiner Boursset of complicity. I believe Naric and Quenalso to be considered guilty of complicity. I further state
I discovered Charrière and Carbonieri in the very act of digging the grave of Madame Privat, which they used as a place to conceal their raft.”

“What have you to say?” asked the governor.

'In the first place Carbonieri has nothing to do with it. The raft is planned to carry one man only - me. I merely forced him to help take the mats off the grave, a job I couldn't do alone. So Carbonieri's not guilty of misappropriation and theft of State material; nor of complicity in an escape, seeing the escape never came off. Boursset is just a poor devil who was threatened with death if he didn't do what he was told. As for Naric and Quenier, I scarcely even know them. I assert that they have nothing whatsoever to do with the matter.'

'That's not what my informer says,' said the screw.

'This Bébert Celier, your informer, may very well be taking his revenge by falsely mixing other men up with this business. Who can trust what an informer says?'

'In short,' said the governor, 'you are officially accused of theft and misappropriation of State material, profanation of a grave and attempting to escape. Be so good as to sign the record.'

'I shan't sign unless my statement about Carbonieri, Boursset and the brothers-in-law Naric and Quenier is added.'

'I grant that. Draw it up.'

I signed. I just can't express what had been going on inside me since this last-moment failure. In the black-hole it was as though I was out of my mind: I scarcely ate and I didn't walk; but I smoked on and on, one cigarette after another. Luckily I was well supplied with tobacco by Dega. Every morning there was an hour's exercise in the punishment cell yard, in the sun.

This morning the governor came and talked to me. There was one odd thing - if the escape had come off, he would have been the one to suffer most; and yet it was he who was the least angry with me.

Smiling, he said his wife had told him it was natural for a man to try to escape, unless he had become utterly demoralized. He very cleverly tried to get me to incriminate Carbonieri. I had the feeling that I'd persuaded him of the contrary, explaining how impossible it was for Carbonieri to refuse to give me a hand for a few moments, pulling off the mats.

Boursset had shown the threatening note and the plans drawn by me. As far as he was concerned the governor was quite convinced that that was how things were. I asked him what he thought this charge of stealing material might come to. He said, 'Not more than eighteen months.'

To cut things short, I gradually began to come up out of the abyss I'd plunged into. I had a note from Chatal, the medical orderly. He told me Bébert Celier was in a ward by himself in the hospital, waiting to be un-interned - a rare disease had been diagnosed: abscess on the liver. This must be something cooked up between the administration and the doctor to protect him from reprisals.

They never searched me or my cell. I took advantage of this to get a knife sent in. I told Naric and Quenier they must ask for the yard warder, Bébert Celier, the joiner and me to be brought face to face with them: they were to ask the governor to take whatever decision about them he thought right after this confrontation - inquiry, disciplinary punishment or a return to freedom in the camp.

At today's exercise Naric told me the governor had agreed. The confrontation would take place tomorrow at ten in the morning. A head warder would be there to conduct the proceedings. All night long I tried to reason with myself; for I meant to kill Bébert Celier. I could not force my mind to alter. No, it would be too unfair if the fellow were to be un-interned for this piece of work and that then on the mainland he should make a break - a reward, as it were, for having prevented one. Yes, but they might condemn you to death, man, because they could accuse you of malice aforethought. I don't give a fuck. That was the conclusion I came to - I had truly lost all hope. Four months of expectation and joy, fear of being caught, intelligent effort: and then, when everything was just coming off, the whole thing pitifully wrecked by the tongue of a former. Come what may, tomorrow I'd try and kill Celier.

The only way of avoiding a death-sentence was to bring out his knife. To do that, I'd have to let him see quite clearly that I had mine open. Then he'd certainly out his. It would have to be done a little before or just at the confrontation. I couldn't kill him during it, because that would mean the risk of a screw shooting me. I relied on the proverbial carelessness of warders.

All night long I struggled against this idea. I could come it. In life there really are some things that can't be given. I know you haven't the right to take things from your own hands: but that's for people belonging to a different social class. It's inconceivable that you shouldn't be able to think of punishing - mercilessly punishing - su-base creature as this. I'd never done this barrack-bird the least harm in the world: he didn't even know me. So he was sending me down for X years of solitary without having the least thing against me. He was trying to burying me alive so that he could live again. Was I going to put up with that? No: I was not. It was inconceivable that I should allow him to profit by his sewer rat's action. Inconceivable. I felt that I was done for. Done for: so let him be done for too, and even more so than me. And what if you're sentenced to death, man? It would be a fool's game to die for such a louse. I reached the point of promising myself just this one thing - if he didn't bring out his knife, I shouldn't kill him.

I didn't sleep at all the whole night, and I smoked right through a packet of tobacco. I only had two cigarettes left when the coffee came round at six in the morning. I was so on edge that although it was forbidden I said to the coffee man, with the screw there, 'Could you let me have a few cigarettes or a little tobacco, with the chief's permission? I'm all in, Monsieur Antartaglia.'

'Yes, give it to him if you've got any. I don't smoke myself. I'm really sorry for you, Papillon. I'm a Corsican, so I like men who are men, and I loathe scum.'

At a quarter to ten I was in the yard, waiting to go into the main room. Naric, Quenier, Boursset and Carbonieri were there too. The screw in charge of us was Antartaglia, the one who'd been there at coffee time. He was talking to Carbonieri in Corsican. I gathered he was saying it was a pity for Carbonieri that this had happened and that he ran the risk of three years solitary. At this moment the gate opened and into the yard came the Arab who had climbed the palm tree, the Arab in charge of the building yard gate, and Bébert Celier. When he saw me he started back, but the warder with them said to him, 'Go on and keep away from the others - stand over there on the right. Antartaglia, don't let there be any communication between them.'

Here we were not two yards from one another. Antartaglia said, 'No talking between the two groups.'

Carbonieri went on talking Corsican with his fellow-countryman, who was watching both sets of men. The screw bent to tie his shoelace: I motioned to Matthieu to move forward a little. He understood at once, looked towards Bébert Celier and spat in his direction. When the screw was upright again

The door opened. I stepped out. And indeed the muscle was deeply cut.

'Put the handcuffs on him and take him to hospital. Don't leave him there on any pretext whatsoever. Bring him back here as soon as he's been treated.'

When we went out there were more than ten screws with the governor. The building yard screw said to me, 'Murderer!'

Before I could reply the governor said, 'Be quiet, Warder Bruet. The man went for Papillon.'

'That's not very likely,' said Bruet.

'I saw it and I'll bear witness,' said Antartaglia. 'And get this, Monsieur Bruet: Corsicans don't lie.'

When we reached the hospital, Chatal sent for the doctor. He sewed me up without gas or a local anaesthetic; then, still without speaking to me, he put on eight clips. I let him do it without a murmur. When it was done he said, 'I couldn't give you a local anaesthetic: I've none left.' Then he added, 'It wasn't right, what you've just done.'

'Oh, in any case he wasn't going to live much longer, you know, not with that abscess on his liver.' This unexpected answer left the medico gaping.

The inquiry was resumed. Bourset was dismissed from the case as having no responsibility whatsoever: it was admitted that he was terrorized, and I did all I could to help this point of view. Naric and Quenier were set aside too, for want of proof. That left Carbonieri and me. The accusations of theft and misappropriation against him were withdrawn, leaving only complicity in attempted escape. The most he could get for this was six months. But as far as I was concerned, things became more complicated. In spite of all the evidence in my favour the man in charge of the inquiry would not accept that I'd acted in self-defence. Dega saw the whole file, and he told me that in spite of the investigator's zeal I couldn't possibly be condemned to death because of my having been wounded. One thing the prosecution used against me was that the two Arabs said they'd seen me draw my knife first.

The inquiry was over. I was waiting to go over to Saint-Laurent to appear before a court-martial. I did nothing but smoke: I hardly walked at all. They granted me an extra hour's exercise in the afternoon. At no time did the governor or any of the warders – apart from the building yard screw and the one in charge of the inquiry – show any hostility to-

. They all talked to me without any kind of enmity

e reached his house. 'Juliette, I've done what I promised I've brought your protégé. I have to take him back again re twelve, as you know. You've got nearly an hour to to him.' And with this he left us.

Juliette came over to me and laid her hand on my shoulder, taking right into my face. Her black eyes shone all the more cause they were swimming with the tears that fortunately e managed to hold back. 'You're out of your mind, friend apillon. If you'd told me you wanted to go, I think I might ave been able to make things easier for you. I've asked my usband to help you all he can, but he tells me that unluckily it doesn't depend on him. I sent for you to see how you were, in the first place. I congratulate you on your spirit - you look much better than I thought you would. And then in the second place to tell you I want to pay you for the fish you've been giving me so generously all these months. Look, here's a thousand francs - it's all I can produce. I'm sorry it's not more.'

'Listen, Madame, I don't need money. Please understand that I can't take it: as I see things it would spoil our friendship.' And I pushed back the money she had so handsomely offered me - two five-hundred franc notes. 'Don't press me, please.'

'As you like,' she said. 'Will you have a drop of pastis?'
And for an hour and more this splendid woman talked to me charmingly. She thought that I should certainly be acquitted for the murder of that swine and that I might get perhaps eighteen months to two years for the rest.
When I left she took my hand in both of hers and pressed it for a long while. She said, 'Au revoir. Good luck,' and burst into tears.

The governor took me back to the punishment block. On the way I said to him, 'Governor, you have the noblest wife on earth.'

'I know it, Papillon: she's not made for this kind of life here – it's too cruel for her. And yet what can I do about it? Still, only four more years and I retire.'

'I'd like to take advantage of our being by ourselves, Governor, to thank you for having me treated as well as possible, in spite of the difficulties you would have had if I'd brought it off.'

'Yes, you might have caused me some very nasty headaches. But for all that, I'll tell you something – you did deserve to succeed.' And as we reached the gate of the punishment block he said, 'Good-bye, Papillon. May God help you: you'll need it.'

'Good-bye, Governor.'

Yes, I was certainly going to need God's help, for the court-martial, with a four-ring Gendarmerie major presiding, was merciless. Three years for theft, misappropriation, violation of a grave and attempted escape: and on top of that five years for the manslaughter of Celier, to run consecutively. Eight years solitary in all. If I'd not been wounded, they'd have condemned me to death for sure.

This court that was so hard on me was more lenient to a Pole named Dandosky, who had killed two men. They only gave him five years, and yet there was premeditation, without a shadow of a doubt.

Dandosky was a baker who made yeast and nothing else. He only worked between three and four in the morning. As the bakery was on the wharf, facing the sea, he spent all his free time fishing. He was a quiet man and he couldn't speak French well: he made close friends with nobody. This lifer kept all his affection for a splendid black cat with green eyes that lived with him. They slept in the same bed; it followed him like a dog and kept him company when he was at work. In short, the man and the cat were devoted to one another. The cat used to go fishing with him, but if the day was too hot and there was no shade, it would walk back by itself to the bakery and lie in its friend's hammock. When the bell went for midday, it would go and meet the Pole, who would give it little fish, dangling them until the cat jumped up and caught them.

court-martial, did not feel much sympathy for me, he did for Dandosky, who was lucky enough to get away with no more than five years for two premeditated murders.

Second Term of Solitary

I went back to the islands chained to this Pole. They hadn't kept us hanging about in the punishment cells of Saint-Laurent! It was on a Monday we got there; we were court-martialled on the Thursday, and on Friday morning they put us on the boat for the islands again.

So we were on our way back, sixteen of us: and of the sixteen twelve were for solitary. During the crossing the sea was very rough, and quite often a larger wave than usual swept along the deck. My despair reached the point of hoping the old tub would sink. I spoke to no one, and the sea-laden wind that stung my face closed me in upon myself. I didn't shelter from it at all. I deliberately let my hat blow off – in eight years of solitary I shouldn't have much need of hats. I faced into the lashing wind and breathed it in so deep it almost choked me. When I'd thought of the ship going down I checked myself, saying, 'The sharks have eaten Bébert Celier: you're thirty, and you've got eight years to serve.' But was it possible to do eight years inside the walls of the man-eater?

As far as my experience went, I thought it was not possible. Four or five must be the limit of any man's resistance. If I'd not killed Celier I'd only have had three years to serve, perhaps only two: because the killing had made everything seem worse, including the escape. I shouldn't have killed the rat. My duty as a man, my duty towards myself, was not to take the law into my own hands, but in the very first place and above all, to live – to live in order to escape. How did I come to make such a mistake? Quite apart from the fact that it was a very close thing whether it was me or that bastard who got killed. Live, live, live: that ought to have been and now must be my one religion.

g the warders escorting the convoy there was one I'd n solitary. I didn't know his name, but I had a great to ask him a question. 'Chief, I'd like to ask you someished, he came over and said, 'What?'

ve you ever known a man who managed to do eight solitary?'

thought, and then said, 'No. But I've known a good y who've done five; and there was even one - I remember very well - who came out quite fit and right in the head r six years. I was there at the Réclusion when they set free.'

Thanks.'

'That's all right,' said the screw. 'You've got eight, I be-ve?'

'Yes, Chief.'

'You'll only manage it if you're never punished.' And he moved away.

That observation was very important. Yes: I should only come out alive if I was never punished. For the punishments were all based on the temporary stopping of rations; and even when you returned to normal diet you could never really get your strength back. A few fairly rigorous punishments would mean you couldn't hold out to the end - you'd kick the bucket first. Moral: I must never take coconuts or cigarettes; never even write or receive messages.

I chewed over this decision all the rest of the trip. Nothing, absolutely nothing either from the outside or from inside. I had an idea: the only way of being helped in the matter of food without danger was for someone outside to pay the scup-carriers so that they should pick me out one of the biggest and best pieces of meat at midday. It would be easy, because one ladled out the broth while another coming behind with a tray put a lump of meat in the bowl. He'd have to scrape the bottom of the pail and give me as many vegetables as possible in my share. Hitting upon this idea was comfort. For that way I could quite well eat enough if I be hungry - I could almost eat as much as I wanted if the scheme was properly carried out. Then it would be up to me to take off and dream as much as possible, pitching up cheerful subjects so as not to go mad.

We reached the islands. It was three in the afternoon was scarcely ashore before I saw Juliette's pale yellow dress, at her husband's side. The governor came quickly over to me, even before we had time to line up, and he said, 'How long?'

'Eight years.'

He went back to his wife and spoke to her. She sat down on a stone, no doubt badly upset. Almost entirely overcome. Her husband took her arm, she stood up, cast me a meaning, sorrowful look from her huge black eyes, and they both moved away without turning back.

'Papillon,' said Dega, 'how long?'

'Eight years solitary.' He said nothing and he didn't even like to look at me. Galgani came up but before he could speak I said to him, 'Don't send me anything: don't write, either. With a sentence this long I can't risk any punishment.'

'I get you.'

In a low voice I quickly added, 'Fix it so they give me as much food as possible at noon and evening. If you can manage that maybe we'll see one another again some day. Good-bye.'

I deliberately walked towards the first boat of those that were to take us across to Saint-Joseph. They all watched me as people watch a coffin being lowered into a grave. No one spoke. During the short crossing I repeated what I'd said to Galgani to Chapar.

'That should be possible. Keep your heart up, Papi.' Then he said, 'And what about Matthieu Carbonier?'

'I'm sorry I forgot him. The president of the court-martial wanted further inquiries to be made into his case before coming to a decision: is that good or bad?'

'Good. I think.'

I was in the first rank of the little column of twelve climbing the hill to reach the Réclusion. I went up fast: it was odd, but I was in a hurry to be alone in my cell. I stepped out so that the screw said, 'Not so fast, Papillon. Anyone would think you couldn't wait to get back to the place you left such a little while ago.'

We were there.

'Strip! Here's the governor of the Réclusion.'

'I'm sorry you're back, Papillon,' he said. Then, 'Confiness, etc.' - his usual piece. 'Block A, cell 127. It's the best, Papillon, because you're opposite the door of the passage and that gives you more light – and you're never short of air. I hope you'll behave well. Eight years is a long time: but who knows, maybe excellent conduct will earn you one or two years remission. I hope so, because you're a brave man.'

So here I was in 127. It was, as he'd said, just opposite a big barred gate that opened on to the passage. I could still see quite clearly, although by now it was nearly six in the evening. And this cell didn't have the smell and taste of decay that had filled my other one. My spirits rose a little. 'Friend Papillon, here are the four walls that are going to watch you live for the next eight years. Don't count months and hours – there's no point. If you want a proper yardstick you must count by units of six months. Sixteen times six months and you're free again. In any case there's one good thing about it. If you die here – at least, if you do it during the day – you'll have the satisfaction of dying in the light. That's very important. It can't be much fun to die in the dark. If you're ill, at least here the doctor can see your face. You don't have to blame yourself for having wanted to escape and make a new life; hell, nor for having killed Celier, either. Imagine how you would have suffered thinking that while you were in here, he was off, making a break! Time will tell. Maybe there'll be an amnesty, a war, or an earthquake or typhoon that will destroy this place. Why not? Maybe there'll be an upright, decent man who'll go back to France and manage to stir up French public opinion so that it will force the prison service to do away with this manner of guillotining people without a guillotine. Maybe a doctor, sickened by it all, will tell some journalist or priest all about it – something of that kind. At all events, the sharks have digested Celier long ago. I'm here: and if I'm up to my own standards, I ought to come out of this living grave on my feet.'

One, two, three, four, five, about-turn; one, two, three, four, five, about-turn. I began walking, going straight back to the right position of head and arms and the exact length of pace for the pendulum to work perfectly. I determined only to walk two hours in the morning and two in the afternoon until I should know whether I could rely on more than the regulation amount of food. Don't let these first edgy days fool you into wasting energy.

Yes, it was pitiful to have failed at the very end. To be sure, it was only the first part of the break, and I should still have had to bring off a crossing of more than ninety miles on that frail raft. And then, according to where we touched the mainland, to have started another escape all over again. If the launching had worked well, the flour-sack sail would have carried the raft along at a good six miles an hour. We'd have reached the mainland in under fifteen hours, perhaps in twelve. That is to say if it rained during the daytime, of course; since it was only with rain falling that we would have dared set the sail. I seemed to remember that it had rained the day after I was put into the black-hole. I couldn't be sure. I tried to see what mistakes or errors I had made. I could only discover two. The joiner had insisted on making too good, too solid a raft; and then, to hold the coconuts, he had had to make a framework that amounted to much the same as two rafts one on top of the other. Hence too many pieces to work up and too much time needed to be able to work on them without danger.

The second, far more serious fault was this: when we had the first hard suspicion about Celier, I ought to have killed him that same night. If I'd done that, who could tell where I'd be now? Even if things had gone sour on the mainland or if I'd been arrested at the moment of the launch, I'd only have copped three years instead of eight, and I'd have had the satisfaction of having done something. And if everything had gone smoothly, where should I be, on the islands or on the mainland? No telling. Maybe talking to Bowen in Trinidad: maybe in Curaçao, under the protection of Bishop Irénée de Bruyne. And we'd only have gone off from Curaçao if we had been certain that some nation or another would allow us in. If they wouldn't, it would have been easy enough to go back alone, sailing a little boat straight to the Goajira and my tribe.

I went to sleep very late, and I rested quite normally. This first night wasn't so very depressing after all. Live, live, live. Every time I was on the point of giving up from despair, I was to repeat 'While there's life there's hope' three times over.

A week had gone by. Since yesterday I had noticed a change in my rations. A splendid lump of boiled meat at midday, and in the evening a bowl crammed with lentils – hardly any water at all. Like a child I said, 'Lentils have iron in them; they are very good for the health.'

If this went on, I was going to be able to walk ten or twelve

s a day; and then, tired out, I'd be ready to take off for stars. No, I was not wandering; I was here on earth, firmly this earth. I thought about all the convicts I'd known on islands: each had his own story, his past and his present.
d I thought of the legends they told on the islands, too.
here was one that I swore I should check if ever I was on the island again - it was the story of the bell.

As I said earlier, the convicts were not buried but thrown into the sea in a shark-infested place between Saint-Joseph and Royale. The dead man was wrapped in flour sacks with a big stone tied to his feet. A rectangular chest - always the same chest - was fixed level in the bows. When the boat reached the right place the six rowers, all convicts, lay on their oars. One man opened a kind of trap-door and another tilted the chest. The corpse slid into the water. There was not the least doubt about it - it was certain that the sharks bit through the rope immediately. No dead man ever had the time to sink to any depth. He came up to the surface and the sharks began fighting over this particular treat of theirs. According to those who had been there, the sight of a man being eaten was very striking indeed, for when there were a great many sharks they managed to thrust the shroud and its contents right up out of the water, tear the flour sacks off, and carry away great lumps of the body.

All this did happen just as I have said, but there was one thing I had been unable to check. Every convict without exception said that what attracted the sharks to this place was the sound of the bell that tolled in the chapel when there was a death. It seems that if you were on the end of the jetty Royale at six in the evening, some days you wouldn't see single shark. When the bell began ringing in the little chapel the place would be stiff with them in no time at all - sh-waiting for the dead man; for there was nothing else to plain their presence there at just that particular moment. Let's hope I shan't be served up to the sharks of Royale that: if they eat me during a break, well that's just too bad, but at least it would be while I was trying to win my freedom.
But not when I'd died of some disease in my cell: no, that mustn't happen.

Thanks to my friends' arrangements I was eating as I needed, and I felt perfectly fit. I walked without from seven in the morning until six in the evening.

evening bowl full of dried vegetables, beans, lentils, split peas or fried rice, went down very easily. I always ate the lot without any effort. Walking did me good; the tiredness it produced was healthy, and I even managed to take off while I was still going to and fro. Yesterday, for example, I spent the whole day in the meadows of a little district in the Ardèche by the name of Favras. When Maman died I often used to go there and spend a few weeks with my aunt, my mother's sister, who was a schoolteacher in the village. Well, yesterday I was as good as there, walking about in the chestnut woods, finding mushrooms; and then I heard a little friend of mine, a shepherd, calling out orders to his dog — orders that the dog carried out perfectly, bringing back a lost sheep or punishing a straying goat. Even better, there in my mouth was the coolness of the iron-bearing spring, and its tiny bubbles tickled my nose. This total recall of a time more than fifteen years in the past and this power of experiencing it again with such vividness is possible only in a cell, far from all noise, in the most profound silence.

I could even see the yellow of Auntie Outine's dress. I heard the wind whispering through the chestnut trees, the sound of a falling chestnut, sharp when it dropped on dry earth and muffled when it came down into a bed of leaves. A huge wild boar came out of the tall broom and frightened me so dreadfully that I tore away, losing most of the mushrooms I had gathered, in my panic. Yes, pacing there in my cell, I spent the whole day at Favras with auntie and my little friend Julien, the shepherd, a child from the Public Assistance. There was no one who could prevent me from delighting in these tender memories, so clear and sharp; and no one could prevent them from giving me the peace my wounded heart so called for.

As far as society was concerned, I was in one of the many punishment cells of the man-eater. In fact I had stolen a whole day from them: I had spent it at Favras, in the meadows and under the chestnut trees; and I had even drunk at the place they called the Peach-tree Spring.

Now the first six months had gone by. I had said I should account by units of six months, and so I had kept my promise. It was only this morning that I reduced the sixteen to fifteen. . . . Only fifteen lengths of six months left.

Let's see how things stand. No outstanding these six months. Always the same food, no adequate amount of it, a ration that meant I didn't suffer. A great many suicides and men going mad around me, carried off quite soon, thank God, depressing to hear men shouting, weeping or moaning hours or even days on end. I had found quite a good way, but one that was bad for the ears. I cut off a bit of soap, stuffed it into my ears so that I should no longer hear awful shrieks. Unfortunately the soap did harm and after day or two both my ears were running.

For the first time since I'd been in penal I lowered myself to ask a screw for something. One of the soup warders came from Montélimar, which was near to my part. I had known him on Royale and I asked him to bring me a ball of wax to help me put up with the row of the maniacs before they were taken off. The next day he brought me a piece the size of a walnut. The relief of not hearing those wretched men any more was quite unbelievable.

I was kept in good training by the big centipedes. I had only been bitten once during these six months. I had learnt to bear it calmly when I woke up and found one of them wandering about on my naked body. You can get used to anything. It's a question of self-control, for the tickling of all those legs and feelers is very unpleasant. But if you catch hold of it the wrong way, you're stung. It's better to wait until it goes of its own accord, then find it and squash it. There were always two or three little bits of today's bread on my concrete stool. Naturally, the smell of the bread attracted the centipedes and they would go in that direction. Then I'd kill them.

I had to get rid of an idea that haunted me all the time. Why didn't I kill Bébert Celier the very day we had doubts about the ugly game he was playing? Starting from that point I argued with myself - when do you have the right to kill? The conclusion was, that the end justifies the means. My end was to make a successful break: I'd had the good luck to make a well-made raft and hide it in a safe place. It was a matter of days before I was to set off. Since I knew dangerous Celier was in the matter of the last section, which reached the right place by something of a miracle, I ought to have killed him without hesitating what if I had been wrong? What if it had only looked was guilty? I should have killed an innocent man. How terrible! But it's unreasonable for you to worry about scruples, you a convict with a life - worse, a convict whose term includes eight years of solitary.

Who do you think you are, you drop-out that the community treats like so much dirt? I'd like to know whether the twelve bastards on the jury have ever once troubled their consciences with wondering if they did right in sending you down for so long. And whether the prosecutor (I'd still not made up my mind how I'd tear out his tongue) had ever wondered if he hadn't come it a little strong in his indictment. I was sure that even my own lawyers didn't remember me. They no doubt talked in general terms about 'that unfortunate Papillon business' at the 1932 assizes. 'That particular day I was not on top of my form, you know, whereas it so happened that Pradel, for the prosecution, was at his very best. He swung the trial in his own favour in the most masterly fashion. He really is an opponent who keeps you on your toes.' I could hear it as though I were next to Maître Raymond Hubert as he was talking to other lawyers, or at some party, or in the corridors of the law-courts.

There was certainly one man who might be set up as a straight-dealing, honest judge, and that was Bevin, the president of the court. That fair-minded man, in professional conversation or at a dinner, might very well speak about the danger of having a man judged by a jury. In proper words, of course, he might very well say that the twelve bastards, the jurymen, were not prepared for a responsibility of that kind, that they might be too easily swayed by the charm either of the prosecution or the defence, whichever happened to be getting the better of the rhetorical contest - that they acquitted too quickly or condemned scarcely knowing why - according to the positive or negative atmosphere that the stronger counsel had managed to create.

The president, and my family too: yes, but perhaps my family was rather against me because of the disgrace I had certainly brought upon them. There was one, only one, who I was sure would never complain of the cross I had laid on his shoulders, and that was my poor old father. He would bear this heavy cross without crying out against it, without blaming him; and this he'd do all the while. Master he respected the laws and even understand and accept them. I was sure that deep inside his heart cried out, 'You swine, you've killed my boy - even if you've condemned him, at twenty-five, to die inch by inch!'

If he knew where his boy was now, and what they were doing to him, he might indeed turn anarchist. Last night the man-eater earned its name even more than usual. I gathered that two men had hanged themselves and that another had choked to death by stuffing his mouth and nostrils with bits of cloth. Cell 127 was near the place where the screws changed guard and sometimes I heard scraps of their talk. This very morning, for instance, they didn't speak so quietly that I missed what they were saying about what had happened during the night.

Another six months had gone by. I took my bearings, and just now I scratched an elegant fourteen on the wood - I'd a nail that I only used every six months. Yes, I took my bearings, and I found that everything was in order from the point of view of health and that my spirits were in an excellent state. Thanks to my wandering among the stars it was very rare that I ever had a lasting fit of despair. I got over them pretty fast and quickly invented a real or imaginary voyage that would dispel the black ideas. Celier's death was a great help to me in these serious fits of depression. I used to say to myself, I'm alive, alive; I'm still alive, and I must go on living, living so as to live a new free life one day. He tried to stop me escaping and now he's dead: he'll never be free one day I'll be free - that's certain and for sure. In any case if I'm thirty-eight when I come out, that's not old, and quite sure the next break will be the right one.

One, two, three, four, five, about-turn: one, two, four, five, about-turn again. For some days now my legs have been black and my gums oozed blood. Should I report I pressed the lower part of my leg with my thumb mark stayed there, a dent. You'd have said I was full of blood. For a week now I'd no longer been able to walk more than twelve hours a day: six hours, taken in two goes, out. When I cleaned my teeth I could not rub them with a rough towel smeared with soap without its hurting me a great deal. There was even one tooth that came out by itself yesterday - an upper incisor.

This third period of six months ended in a complete

Yesterday they made us all poke our heads out through the hole and a doctor went by raising each man's lips. And this morning, when I'd done exactly eighteen months in this cell, the door opened and they said, 'Come out: stand against the wall and wait.'

I was the first at the gate end: about seventy men were brought out. 'About turn!' And now I was at the end of a line of men marching towards the other end of the building and out into the yard.

Nine o'clock. A young medico in a short-sleeved khaki shirt sitting at a little wooden table in the open air. Two convict orderlies next to him; one medical warder. I knew none of them, not even the medico. Ten screws with rifles kept the whole party covered. The governor and head warders stood there, watching silently.

'Everyone strip!' shouted the head warder. 'Clothes under your arms. First man. Name?'

'Open your mouth and stand with your legs apart. Take these three teeth out for him. Tincture of iodine first, then methylene blue: syrup of cochlearia twice a day before meals.'

I was the last in the line,

'Name?'

'Charrière.'

'Why, you're the only one with a body that's something like. Have you just come in?'

'No.'

'How long have you been here?'

'Eighteen months today.'

'Why aren't you thin like the others?'

'I don't know.'

'All right, I'll tell you. Because you eat better than them; unless maybe you masturbate less. Mouth: legs. Two lemons a day, one in the morning, one at night. Suck the lemons and rub the juice on your gums: you've got scurvy.'

They cleaned my gums with iodine, then daubed them with methylene blue: they gave me a lemon. About turn. I went back to my cell, the last in the file.

What had just happened – this bringing the sick men right out into the yard, so they could see the sun and the doctor could see them close to – was a genuine revolution. Nothing of the kind had ever been known in the Réclusion. What was happening? Could it be that at last there was a doctor who would not be a mute accomplice – who would not apply these infamous rules? This medico, who later became my friend, was called Germain Guibert. He died in Indo-China. Many years after this particular day, his wife wrote to me at Maracaibo in Venezuela to tell me about it.

Every ten days, medical inspection in the sun. Always the same treatment – iodine, methylene blue, two lemons. My condition grew no worse, but it didn't get any better, either. Twice I asked for syrup of cochlearia and twice the doctor wouldn't let me have it: this began to irritate me; because I still couldn't walk for more than six hours a day and because the lower part of my legs was still black and swollen.

One day when I was waiting my turn to be looked at, I noticed that the spindly tree in whose meagre shade I was standing was a lemon tree with no lemons on it. I picked a leaf and chewed it; and then without thinking I broke off a twig with some leaves on it – I had no clear notion in my mind as I did so. When the medico called me I stuffed the twig up my arse and said, 'Doctor, I don't know whether it's the fault of all your lemons, but look what I've got growing behind.' And I turned round to show him the leafy twig.

The screws roared with laughter at first, but then the head warden said, 'Papillon, you'll be punished for disrespect to the doctor.'

'Not at all,' said the doctor. 'I make no complaint, so you can't punish him. Don't you want any more lemons? Is that what you're trying to say?'

'Yes, Doctor: I'm fed up with lemons. I'm not getting better: I want to try the cochlearia syrup.'

'I've not given you any because there's not much of it and I keep it for the very serious cases. Still, I'll let you have one spoonful a day, and we'll continue the lemons.'

'Doctor, I used to see the Indians eat seaweed: I noticed the same kind on Royale. There must be some on Saint-Joseph too.'

'That's a very valuable idea. I'll have a daily distribution of a certain seaweed I have seen growing round the coast myself. Did the Indians eat it cooked or raw?'

'Raw.'

'Very good: thank you. And Governor, I rely upon you to see that this man is not punished.'

'All right, Captain.'

It was a miracle that had been accomplished. Leaving your cell every week and standing in the sun for a couple of hours waiting your turn or waiting for the others to be seen to, seeing faces, whispering a few words – who would ever have dreamt that such a wonderful thing could happen? It made a fantastic difference to everybody. Dead men got up and walked about in the sun: these people who had been buried alive could at last speak to each other. It was oxygen, breathing fresh life into all of us.

Clack, clack, innumerable clacks as all the cell doors opened at nine o'clock one Thursday morning. Each man was to stand there on the threshold of his cell. 'Confinees,' shouted a voice, 'Governor's inspection.'

A tall, distinguished, grey-haired man walked slowly down the corridor, passing in front of each cell; with him there were five officers of the colonial service, all doctors, no doubt. I heard him being told the heavy sentences and the reasons for them. Before he reached me, a prisoner who had not been strong enough to stand so long was helped to his feet. This was Graville, one of the cannibals. An officer said, 'But this man's a walking corpse!'

The governor replied, 'They are all of them in a lamentable condition.'

The committee reached me. The local governor said, 'This man has the longest sentence in the prison.'

'What is your name?' asked the governor.

'Charrière.'

'Your sentence?'

'Eight years for stealing material belonging to the State, etc., manslaughter – three and five years consecutive.'

'How many have you done?'

'Eighteen months.'

'How has he behaved?'

'Well,' said the local governor,

'His health?'

'Fair,' said the medico.

'What have you to say?'

'That this system is inhuman and unworthy of a nation like France.'

So there I was, miraculously back on Royale as an ordinary convict serving an ordinary sentence. I'd left, sent down for eight years; and because of the attempt at life-saving, here I was back in nineteen months.

I was with my friends again: Dega was still chief accountant and Galgani postman; Carbonieri too was there, having been acquitted on the escaping charge, and so were Grandet, Boursset the joiner, Chatal of the infirmary, and the pram boys, Naric and Quenier: and still on Royale as assistant medical orderly, Masurette, the partner of my first break.

The Corsican gangsters were all still there too - Essari, Vicioli, Césari, Razori, Fosco, Maucuer and Chapar, who had sent La Griffe to the guillotine over the Marseilles stock-exchange job. All the star turns of the criminal court reports from 1927 to 1935 were there.

Marsino, the man who murdered Dufrené, died last week of general debility. The sharks had a very special dish that day - the most highly esteemed gem expert in Paris.

Barrat, whom they called the Actress, the millionaire tennis champion from Limoges, who murdered a chauffeur and his boy-friend - his too friendly boy-friend - Barrat was head of the laboratory and dispenser in the Royale hospital. One of the doctors who was fond of his joke said that on the island you were tubercular by jus primae noctis.

In a word, my arrival on Royale was a bombshell. It was Saturday morning when I walked into the hard cases' block once more. Almost everyone was there, and all of them without exception, welcomed me in the most friendly way I can imagine. Even the watch-mending character who had never spoken since that famous morning when they guillotined him by mistake, came over and said hallo.

'Well, brothers, are you all OK?'

'Yes Papi: and you're very welcome back.'

'You've still got your place,' said Gracien. 'It's been kept empty ever since the day you left.'

'Thanks, everybody. What's new?'

'One good thing.'

'What's that?'

'Last night they found the Arab who informed on you killed in the hall opposite the good conduct - the Arab who climbed the palm tree and watched. It must have been some friend of yours who didn't want you to have to come across him alive, and who's spared you the trouble.'

'I'd very much like to know who it was, so as to thank him.'

'Maybe he'll tell you one day. They found the Arab at the roll-call with a knife in his heart. Nobody had seen or heard anything at all.'

'It's better that way. How's the gambling?'

'Fine. Your place is still open.'

'Good.' So now I was about to start living like a man with a life sentence again: who could tell how and when the story would end?

'Papi, we were really upset when we heard you'd copped an eight-stretch. I don't think there's a single man on the islands now who'd refuse to help you, now you're back again, whatever the risk.'

'The governor wants you,' said an Arab.

I went out with him. Several screws in the guard-room spoke pleasantly as I went through: I followed the Arab, and there was Governor Prouillet.

'Are you all right, Papillon?'

'Yes, Governor.'

'I'm glad you've been pardoned, and I congratulate you on your brave attempt at saving my colleague's little girl.'

'Thanks.'

'I'm going to make you an ox-driver until you can be a cesspit man again with the right to go fishing.'

'If that doesn't compromise you too much, fine.'

'That's my business. The building yard chief is no longer here, and as for me, I'm off to France in three weeks. You start tomorrow.'

'I don't know how to thank you, Governor.'

'Perhaps by waiting a month before you try another break?' said Prouillet, laughing.

The men in our block were still the same men; their way of life was still the same as it had been before I went away. The gamblers, a class apart, thought of nothing and lived for nothing but cards. The men who had boys lived and ate and slept with them. They were genuine couples, with their thoughts taken up, day and night, by their passion and by homosexual love. Jealous scenes, unchecked furious emotions in which the 'wife' and the 'husband' each kept secret watch on the other and which inevitably set off killings when one got tired of the other and drifted away to other lovers.

Only last week the Negro Simplon killed a man by the name of Sidero, all for the sake of the lovely Charlie (Barrat). This was the third man Simplon had killed because of Charlie.

I had only been in the camp a few hours before two characters came to see me. 'Tell me, Papillon, I'd like to ask whether Maturette is your baby or not.'

'Why?'

'Personal reasons.'

'Listen. Maturette made a thousand-mile break with me and he behaved himself like a man: that's all I've got to say.'

'I wanted to know if he was sweet on you.'

'No. From the point of view of sex, I know nothing about Maturette. From the point of view of friendship, I think he's great: the rest's nothing to do with me, unless anyone does him harm.'

'And suppose one day he was my wife?'

'If he was willing, I'd never interfere in such matters. But if by any chance you were to threaten him so as to get him to be your boy-friend, then you'd have to reckon with me.'

It was the same, whether the homosexuals were active or passive; for both kinds settled down to live in their passion, thinking of nothing else at all.

I met the Italian with the gold charger, the one who had been in our convoy. He came and said hallo. I said, 'You still here?'

'I've done everything I can. My mother sent me twelve thousand francs: the screw took six thousand for his commission: I paid four thousand to get myself un-interned and I managed to be sent to Cayenne for an X-ray. But I couldn't do a thing there. Then after that I got myself accused of wounding a friend. You know him - Razori, the Corsican strong-arm man.'

'Yes: and what then?'

'We came to an agreement: he cut himself in the belly and he and I were taken over for a court-martial – he being the accuser and me the defendant. We never even got going at all. In a fortnight it was all over. I copped six months and I did them in the Réclusion last year. You didn't even know I was there. Papi, I can't bear it any more. I feel like killing myself.'

'It would be better to perish at sea, escaping: at least you'd die free.'

'You're right: I'm ready for anything. If you think something up, let me know.'

'OK.'

And so life on Royale began again. I was an ox-driver and I had a buffalo called Brutus. He weighed two tons and as far as the other buffaloes were concerned he was a killer. He had already put paid to two other males. 'This is his last chance,' said Agostini, the warder in charge of the job. 'If he kills another, he'll be slaughtered.'

This morning I had my first meeting with Brutus. The Martinique Negro who drove him was to stay for a week to teach me the job. I made friends with Brutus at once by pissing on his muzzle: he adored lapping the taste of salt. Then I gave him some green mangoes I'd picked up in the hospital garden. With Brutus yoked to the great pole of a roughly-made cart – it might have belonged to the Pharaohs – carrying a six hundred gallon barrel, I went down to the beach. It was my job, and friend Brutus's, to go down, fill the barrel, and then climb that terrible slope up to the plateau. There I opened the tap and the water ran down the channels, carrying away everything that was left from the morning's emptying. I began at six and by about nine I was through.

After four days the Martiniquais said I could get along by myself. There was only one snag – I had to swim in the pond at five in the morning, looking for Brutus, who did not care for work and used to hide there. He had very sensitive nostrils, and there was a ring through them with two feet of chain hanging there permanently. Whenever I found him, he would draw back, dive, and come up farther off. Sometimes it took me more than an hour to catch him in this revolting stagnant pool, full of creatures and water-lilies. All by myself there I'd fly into a gibbering rage. 'Swinel You slow-bellied obstinate bastard! Will you get the hell out of this water?' The only thing he minded was the chain when I caught him. The insults never wounded him in the least. But when at last he was brought out of the pond, then we were close friends again.

I had two old lard drums that I kept full of clean, fresh water. I started by taking a shower to get the slime off from the pool. Then when I was thoroughly soaped and rinsed I usually had more than half a drum left, and I'd wash Brutus, scrubbing him with the hairy husk of a coconut. I went carefully over his delicate parts and sprinkled him as I scrubbed. Brutus would rub his head against my hands and go and stand in front of the shafts all by himself. I never used the goad on him like the Martiniquais. He was grateful, and he'd walk quicker for me than he did for the Negro.

There was a pretty little buffalo cow who was in love with Brutus: she went along with us, walking at his side. I did not shoo her away as the other driver did - far from it, I let her kiss Brutus and come with us wherever we went. I never disturbed them when they were kissing, and Brutus showed his gratitude by carrying up his six hundred gallons at an extraordinary pace. He looked as though he were trying to make up for the time he had spent in his dallying with Marguerite - for Marguerite was the cow-buffalo's name.

Yesterday, at the six o'clock roll-call, there was a little scene on account of Marguerite. It seems that the Martiniquais used to get up on a little wall, and from this height he stuffed her every day. He was caught at it by a screw, and he got thirty days in the black-hole. Bestiality was the official charge. And yesterday, when the roll was being called, Marguerite appeared in the camp, walked along past more than sixty men and reached the Negro: there she turned about, presenting him with her bottom. Everybody howled with laughter, and the blackamoor went grey with shame and confusion.

I had to make three trips a day. The longest part was the filling of the barrel by the two men at the shore; but it was fairly quick. By nine I was through and I could go off fishing.

I made an ally of Marguerite so as to get Brutus out of the pond. When I scratched her ear in a certain way she uttered a sound very like the voice of a mare in season. At this Brutus would come out of his own accord. Although I no longer needed to wash myself, I went on grooming him, and better than before. Shining clean and free from the stench of the disgusting water he spent the night in, he was even more attractive to Marguerite, and that raised his spirits wonderfully.

Half way up the hill from the sea there was a flattish place where I kept a big stone. Brutus had the habit of drawing breath there for five minutes, and I wedged the wheel with the stone, so he could rest better. But this morning there was another buffalo called Danton, as big as Brutus, who was waiting for us hidden behind the little coconut palms that were nothing more than leaves, for this was the nursery garden. Danton rushed out and went for Brutus. Brutus dodged and avoided the charge: Danton hit the cart. One of his horns pierced the barrel. He made prodigious efforts to free himself, while I was unyoking Brutus. Once he was unharnessed, Brutus took his distance, a good thirty yards up the slope, and charged straight at Danton. Dread or despair made Danton wrench free, leaving the tip of his horn in the barrel, before my buffalo reached him; but Brutus couldn't stop and he smashed into the cart, turning it over.

Then one of the strangest things I've ever seen took place. Brutus and Danton touched their horns without thrusting; they just rubbed these huge weapons gently together. It looked as though they were talking, and yet they merely blew - uttered no sound. Then the cow buffalo walked slowly up the hill, followed by the two bulls, who stopped every now and then to rub horns again, entwining them gently. When they took too long over it Marguerite moaned languourously and set off again in the direction of the plateau. The two great monsters, still following the same line, moved after her. After three halts, with the same ceremonies each time, we reached the plateau. We came out on the flat in front of the lighthouse, a bare stretch of ground about three hundred yards long. At the far end, the convicts' camp: right and left, the two hospitals, the one for the prisoners and the other for the soldiers.

Danton and Brutus were still following, twenty yards behind. Marguerite paced calmly to the middle and stood there. The two rivals joined her. From time to time she uttered her wail, a long and markedly sexual cry. Once again they touched horns, but this time I had the feeling that they really were talking together, because in among their blowing there were sounds that no doubt meant something.

After this conversation the one walked off slowly to the left and the other to the right. They went as far as the limits of the flat stretch. So between them there lay three hundred yards. Marguerite waited, still standing there in the middle. I grasped what it was all about now: this was a proper formal duel, agreed to on either side, with the cow buffalo as the prize. She was quite willing, too; and she was as proud as a peacock that her two boy-friends were going to fight for her.

A cry from Marguerite and they launched themselves at one another. I don't have to say how their two tons increased in force with their speed as each covered his hundred and fifty yards. The crash of the two heads was so violent that for more than five minutes they were both stunned. Brutus was the first to recover, and this time he galloped back to his place. The battle lasted two hours. The screws wanted to kill Brutus, but I wouldn't let them: then, at a certain moment Danton broke a horn as they crashed together – the horn he'd damaged with the barrel. He fled, with Brutus after him. The chase and the fight went on until the next day. They smashed everything that stood in their way – gardens, graveyard, laundry.

They fought all night, and it was only at about seven the next morning that Brutus managed to get Danton up against the wall of the butchery down by the sea, and there he thrust a horn its whole depth into Danton's belly. To finish it off thoroughly Brutus rolled over twice, so that the horn, deep inside, should turn in Danton's belly. And Danton, in the midst of a flood of guts and blood, fell, conquered and destroyed.

This battle between giants had so weakened Brutus that I had to pull the horn out for him so that he could get to his feet again. He staggered off along the path by the sea, and there Marguerite joined him, walking by his side and supporting his huge neck with her hornless head.

I was unable to be present at their wedding night, because the screw in charge of the buffaloes accused me of having unharnessed Brutus, and I was sacked.

I asked to see the governor to talk to him about Brutus.

'What's been going on, Papillon? Brutus must be slaughtered: he's too dangerous. This makes three fine specimens he's killed now.'

'That's just what I came for – to ask you to save Brutus. The farm screw in charge of the buffaloes knows nothing about it. Please let me tell you how Brutus came to act in legitimate self-defence.'

The governor smiled. 'I'm listening.'

'...so you understand, Governor, my buffalo was the one who was attacked,' I ended, having told him all the details. 'What's more, if I hadn't unharnessed Brutus, Danton would have killed him when he was unable to stand up for himself, fastened to his yoke and the cart the way he was.'

'That's true,' said the governor.

At this point the farm screw appeared. 'Good morning, Governor. I've been looking for you, Papillon: this morning you walked out of the camp as though you were going to your job. But your job's gone - you've been sacked.'

'Monsieur Agostini, I went out to see whether I could stop the fight, but unfortunately they were absolutely mad with rage.'

'Well, that may be so. But you're not driving that buffalo any more, as I've already told you. In any case, he's going to be slaughtered on Sunday morning - he'll provide meat for the whole gaol.'

'You can't do that.'

'You're not the one who's going to stop me.'

'No, but the governor is. And if that's not enough, then Doctor Germain Guibert will - I'll ask him to step in and save Brutus.'

'What are you interfering for?'

'Because it's my business. I'm the buffalo's driver, and he's my friend.'

'Your friend? A buffalo? Are you trying to be funny?'

'Monsieur Agostini, will you listen to me for a minute?'

'Let him speak in his buffalo's defence,' said the governor.

'All right. Talk away.'

'Monsieur Agostini, do you think animals can speak to one another?'

'Why not, seeing they communicate?'

'Well, then, Brutus and Danton agreed to fight a duel' and once again I explained the whole thing, from beginning to end.

'Cristachol' said the Corsican. 'You're a proper old character, Papillon. Do what you like about Brutus, but the next time he breaks out, no one'll save him, not even the governor. You can be a driver again. See to it that Brutus ~~is~~ soon.'

Two days later Brutus returned to his daily sea-water tigue, accompanied by his certificated mate Marguerite, and telling the cart that the building yard craftsmen had repaired.
Then we reached our resting place, with the cart thoroughly wedged with the stone. I said, 'Where's Danton, Brutus?' And with a single heave the great monster set the cart in motion, finishing the whole journey without a pause, nimbly pacing along with a conqueror's tread.

Mutiny at Saint-Joseph

The islands were extremely dangerous because of the apparent freedom the men enjoyed. It irked me deeply to see everybody settling down comfortably to lead a trouble-free existence. Some waited for the end of their time; some did nothing at all but wallow in their vices.

Last night I was lying in my hammock: at the far end of the room the gambling was so hot that my two friends, Carbonieri and Grandet, had been obliged to join forces to keep control; one man would not have been enough. As for me
I was trying to revive my memories of the past. They wouldn't come: you would have thought the assizes had never existed.
I tried to light up the dim figures of that day which had been so fatal for me, but in vain: I could not see a single person clearly. The only one to appear in all his harsh reality was the prosecuting counsel. Christ, I thought I'd overcome you for good and all when I was with the Bowens in Trinidad. What kind of ill luck have you put on me, you louse, for six months to go bad on me? When you heard I'd made the first, the from penal, did you manage to sleep easy? I'd very much to know if you were frightened or if all you felt was fear the idea of your prey escaping from the way down the dark the path you'd put him on forty-three days earlier. I'd been out of the cage. Why was I fated to come back to you eleven months later? Perhaps God was punishing me for pising the primitive but beautiful – oh so beautiful – life that I could have gone on living for ever, if I'd liked.

My two loves, Lali and Zoraïma; my tribe without a single gendarme and no laws except for the closest understanding between its members – yes, it's my own fault I'm here, but I must think of one thing only. Only one thing – escape, escape, escape or die.

Prosecutor, when you learnt I had been retaken and sent back to the settlement, you certainly put on your conquering assizes smile, didn't you? You thought, 'Now everything's fine: he's back where I put him, on the way down the drain.' And you were wrong: my heart and soul will never belong to this degrading way of life. All you have a hold on is my body: twice every day your guards and your prison system take note that I am present, and that satisfies you. At six in the morning, 'Papillon?' 'Here.' Six in the evening, 'Papillon?' 'Here.' All's well. We've had our hands on him nearly six years now; he must be beginning to rot, and with a little luck one of these days the bell will toll for the sharks to come and receive him with all due honours – the daily feast provided for them by your system of getting rid of men by wearing them out.

You've got it wrong: your figures don't add up. My physical presence has nothing to do with my spiritual presence. Do you want me to tell you something? I don't belong in this prison: I've not adopted the ways of my fellow-prisoners in the smallest degree, not even of my closest friends. I'm on my toes for a break twenty-four hours a day.

I was arguing with the prosecutor when two men came up to my hammock.

'You asleep, Papillon?'

'No.'

'We'd like to talk to you.'

'Talk away. If you speak quietly, no one can hear.'

'Listen, we're getting ready for a mutiny.'

'What's your plan?'

'Kill all the Arabs, all the screws, all the screws' wives and all their children – bad seed, the whole lot. Me – my name's Arnaud – and my friend Hautin, together with four men who're with us, are going to attack the command-post arsenal. I work there keeping the weapons in order. There are twenty-three light machine-guns, more than eighty rifles and carbines. We'll set about it the ...'

'Stop: don't go on. I'm not with you. I'll have nothing to do with it. Thanks for letting me into your secret, but I'm not with you.'

'We thought you'd agree to lead the rising. Just let me tell you the details we've worked out and you'll see it can't go wrong. We've been planning it these last five months. There are more than fifty men with us.'

'Don't you tell me a single name: I refuse to be the leader or to make the slightest move in this business.'

'Why? You owe us an explanation, after the way we've trusted you, telling you everything.'

'In the first place I never asked you to tell me your plans. And in the second, I do what I want to do in this life, and not what other people want me to do. And in the third I'm not a mass killer. I may kill a man I've got something serious against; but not women and children who've done me no harm. What's more, you don't seem to realize the worst side of it all, and I'll have to tell you - even if you bring this rising off, you necessarily fail.'

'How come?'

'Because the main thing, escaping, just isn't possible. Suppose a hundred men join in the mutiny, how are they going to get away? There are only two boats on the islands. At the very outside limit they can't carry more than forty convicts between them. What are you going to do about the other sixty?'

'We'll be among the forty who leave in the boats.'

'That's what you think: but the others aren't bloodier fools than you are. They'll be armed like you, and if each one's got the smallest scrap of brain, he's not going to put up with being wiped out like you say. You'll be shooting one another to get into the boats. And still worse, there's not a country on earth that'll allow these two boats to land, because telegrams will get to every possible country before you - particularly with the holocaust you mean to leave behind. Anywhere on earth you'll be arrested and handed back to France. As you know, I came back from Colombia: I know what I'm talking about. I give you my sacred word that after a job like that you'll be handed back from anywhere in the world.'

'Right. So you refuse?'

'Yes.'

'It's your last word?'

'I'm absolutely determined.'

'There's nothing left for us but to go.'

'One minute. I ask you not to speak to any of my friends about this plan.'

'Why not?'

'Because I know beforehand they'll refuse; so it's not worth it.'

'All right.'

'Do you feel you can't possibly give up this scheme?'

'Speaking straight, Papillon, no.'

'I can't understand what you're aiming at; because I tell you very seriously that even if you do bring the rising off, you'll never be free.'

'What we want above all is our revenge. And now you've shown us it's impossible to find any country that would let us stay, then we'll take to the bush – we'll live as a gang in the forest.'

'I give you my word I shan't speak about this even to my best friend.'

'We're quite certain of that.'

'OK. One last thing – give me the nod a week ahead so I can get across to Saint-Joseph and not be on Royale when it starts.'

'You'll be warned in time to change islands.'

'Isn't there anything I can do to make you change your minds? Wouldn't you like to work out some other scheme with me? Steal four carbines, for instance, and attack the guard on the boats without killing anyone. Then take a boat and go off together.'

'No. We've gone through too much. For us the great thing is revenge, even if it costs us our lives.'

'And the kids too? And the women?'

'It's all the same seed, the same blood: they must all die, every one of them.'

'Let's not talk about it any more.'

'You don't wish us good luck?'

'No. What I say to you is, give it up. There are better things to do than this bloody butchery.'

'You don't agree we've got the right to have our revenge?'

'Yes, but not on people who've done no wrong.'

'Good night.'

'Good night. Nothing's been said, right, Pami?'

'Right, brothers.'

And Hautin and Arnaud went away A hell of a caper this is! These guys are right off their heads: and what's more they say there are fifty or sixty others mixed up in it. By their D-day there'll be more than a hundred. What a crazy scheme! Not a single one of my friends has given me the least hint of it, so these two can only have talked to the squares. It's just not possible any men belonging to our world should be in this plot. And that makes it all the worse, because your square murderers are the genuine murderers – your underworld character may kill, but just by way of manslaughter, which is not the same thing at all.

For a week I very quietly gathered information about Arnaud and Hautin. Arnaud had been sent down for life – unjustly it seemed – for a little job that didn't even deserve ten years. The reason why the jury had come down on him so heavy was that the year before his brother had been guillotined for killing a cop. So he'd been condemned to this hideous sentence just because the prosecutor, who'd talked more about his brother than about him, had managed to work up a very hostile atmosphere. He'd also been horribly tortured at the time of his arrest, because of what his brother had done.

Hautin had never known freedom: he'd been in prison since the age of nine. Just before leaving the reformatory school when he was nineteen he killed a guy: this was when he was on the point of going into the navy – he'd enlisted to get out of the school. He must have been a trifle crazy, because it seems his plan was to get to Venezuela, work in a gold-mine there, and blow off one of his legs for the compensation-money. This leg was stiff, on account of some chemical or other he'd injected into it at Saint-Martin-de-Ré.

Bombshell. At this morning's roll-call Arnaud, Hautin and Jean Carbonieri, my friend Matthieu's brother, were taken out of the ranks. Jean was a baker, and so he lived down on the quay, near the boats. They were sent to Saint-Joseph without any explanation or apparent reason. I tried to find out why. Not a word: yet Arnaud had been looking after the armoury for four years now, and Jean Carbonieri had been a baker for five. This couldn't be just chance. There must have been a leak; but just what kind of a leak; and how far had it gone?

I decided to talk to my three closest friends, Matthieu Carbonieri, Grandet and Galgani. None of them knew a thing. So Hautin and Arnaud could only have tackled the convicts who didn't belong to the underworld.

'Why did they speak to me, then?'

'Because everyone knows you want to escape at any price at all.'

'Not at that price, though.'

'They couldn't tell the odds.'

'And what about your brother Jean?'

'God knows how he ever came to be such a bloody fool as to get into a mess like this.'

'Maybe the guy that shopped him just said he was in it: maybe he's nothing to do with it at all.'

Things began to move faster and faster. Last night Birasolo was murdered as he was going into the latrine. Blood was found on the Martiniquais ox-driver's shirt. Two weeks after a much too hasty inquiry and a statement by another Negro they kept shut up by himself, the Martiniquais was condemned to death by a special court.

An old lag called Garvel or the Savoyard came and spoke to me by the wash-house in the yard. 'Papi, I'm in a hell of a fix; because it was me that killed Girasolo. I'd like to save the darkie, but I'm scared they'd guillotine me. And I'm not opening my mouth at that price. But if I could find a way of getting off with no more than three to five years, I'd confess.'

'What's your sentence?'

'Twenty years.'

'How many have you done?'

'Twelve.'

'Find some way of getting life, and then they won't put you in solitary.'

'How can I do that?'

'Give me time to think: I'll tell you tonight.' That was I said to Garvel, 'You can't fix it so that you'll be out and then you confess.'

'Why not?'

'You're too likely to be condemned to death. The only way of avoiding solitary is to get life. Do the same as I did. Say your conscience won't let you go to bed at night without have his head chopped off. Put a Confession in your name. I'll tell you the same when I'm out of here.'

got to move fast. They mustn't top him too quick. Wait two or three days.'

I spoke to a warder named Collona and he gave me a wonderful idea. I was to take Garvel to the governor myself and say he had asked me to defend him and to come with him to own up: and I was to say I'd promised him it was impossible he should be condemned to death after such a noble action, but that it was a very serious offence and he must expect to be given life.

It all ran perfectly. Garvel saved the darkie, who was let out straight away. The perjured witness was given a year in prison. Robert Garvel got life.

All this was two months ago. Now that it was over and done with, Garvel told me all about it. Girasolo had agreed to join in the rising; he had been told all the details; and he was the man who betrayed Arnaud, Hautin and Jean Carbonieri. Luckily he hadn't known any of the other names.

The denunciation was so huge, so prodigious, the screws didn't believe in it. Still, by way of precaution they did send the three convicts who'd been informed upon to Saint-Joseph, without saying anything to them or questioning them or anything.

'What did you give as a reason for killing him, Garvel?'

'I said he'd stolen my charger. I said he slept opposite me, which was true, and that at night I took my charger out and hid it under the blanket I use as a pillow. One night I went to the latrine and when I came back my charger had gone. And near my place there was only one man who wasn't asleep - Girasolo. The screws believed what I said: they didn't even tell me he'd informed about a mutiny that was likely to break out.'

'Papillon! Papillon!' they shouted from the yard. 'Roll-call! Come on!'

'Here,' I answered when my name was called.

'Pack your things. You're for Saint-Joseph.'

'Oh, hell.'

War had just broken out in France. It brought with it a new kind of discipline: the service chiefs who were answerable for an escape would henceforward be dismissed the service. Transportees arrested during an escape were to be sentenced to death. Escape was to be considered as proof of a desire to join the Free French, who were betraying France. Everything would be tolerated except for escape.

Governor Prouillet had left two months earlier. I didn't know the new man at all. Nothing to be done about it. I said good-bye to my friends. At eight o'clock I got into the boat for Saint-Joseph.

Lisette's father was no longer in the camp there. He had left for Cayenne with his family the week before. The present governor of Saint-Joseph was a man from Le Havre by the name of Dutain. It was he who received me. I was alone, as it happened, and the head warder in charge of the boat handed me over to the duty screw on the wharf together with some papers that went with me.

'You're the one they call Papillon?'

'Yes, Governor.'

'You're an odd character,' he observed, leafing through my papers.

'What's so odd about me?'

'Because on the one hand you're marked down as dangerous from every point of view, with a particular note in red saying "In a continual state of preparedness for escape". And then on the other, there's the remark, "Attempted to save the governor of Saint-Joseph's child from the sharks". I've two little girls myself, Papillon. Would you like to see them?'

He called, and two very fair-haired children of three and five came in, together with a young Arab dressed all in white and a very pretty dark-haired woman.

'You see this man, my dear? He was the one who tried to save your god-daughter Lisette.'

'Oh, let me shake you by the hand,' said the young woman.

Shaking a convict's hand is the greatest honour you can pay him. People never offer their hands to a man in prison. I found this spontaneous gesture very moving.

'Yes, I'm Lisette's godmother. We are very close friends of the Grandoits. What are you going to do for him, my dear?'

'He'll go to the camp first, and then,' he said, speaking to me, 'you'll let me know what job you'd like me to give you.'

'Thank you, Governor. Thank you, Madame. Please would you tell me why I've been sent to Saint-Joseph? It's almost a punishment.'

'There was no reason that I know of. I dare say the new governor was afraid you'd escape.'

'He's not wrong.'

'They've increased the penalties for the officials who have to answer for an escape. Before the war you might perhaps lose a stripe: now it's certain, quite apart from all the rest. That's why he's sent you here. He'd rather you went to Saint-Joseph, where he has no responsibility, than stay on Royale, where he has.'

'How long do you have to stay here, Governor?'

'Eighteen months.'

'I can't wait that long; but I'll find some way of getting back to Royale so as not to do you any harm.'

'Thank you,' said the woman. 'I'm glad to know you're so great-hearted. If there's anything at all you need, don't hesitate to come here. Papa, you must tell the guard-room of the camp that Papillon is to be brought to see me whenever he asks.'

'Yes, my dear. Mohamed, take Papillon to the camp; and Papillon, you choose the block you want to be put into.'

'Oh, that's easy enough: put me in the "dangerous" block.'

'That won't be hard,' said the governor, laughing. And he wrote out a paper that he gave to Mohamed.

I left the house on the quay that served as the governor's residence and his office – once Lisette's house – and escorted by the young Arab, I reached the camp.

The man in charge of the guard-room was a very ferocious old Corsican, a well-known killer. His name was Filissari. 'So it's you, Papillon, is it? Now I'm all good or all bad, as you know. So don't you try and escape with me, because if you fail I'll kill you out of hand. I'm retiring in two years, so now's the time I hit really hard'

'Well now, I like all Corsicans; so although I won't promise not to escape, if I do I'll fix it so it's a time when you're not on duty.'

'Fine, Papillon. That way we shan't be enemies. Young men can put up with all the trouble and fuss after an escape better than me. I couldn't stand it, not at my age and just before I retire. So it's a deal, then? Get along to the block you've been put down for.'

Here I was in the camp, in a block exactly like the one on Royale, with between a hundred and a hundred and twenty men in it. Pierrot le Fou, Hautin, Arnaud and Jean Carbonieri were all there. Rightly speaking, I ought to have joined Jean's gourbi, seeing he was Matthieu's brother; but he hadn't Matthieu's quality, and then again I didn't care for his friendship with Hautin and Arnaud. So I left him alone and settled down next to Carrier, the Bordelais they called Pierrot le Fou.

The Ile Saint-Joseph was wilder than Royale and rather smaller, though it seemed bigger because it ran more to length. The camp was half way up, for the island consisted of two plateaux one over the other. The first one had the camp on it, and the higher one the grim Réclusion. By the way, the men in solitary were still going down to bathe for an hour every day. Let's hope it would last.

Every dinner-time the Arab who worked in the governor's house brought me three mess-tins fitting into one another and held by a wooden handle. He left these three tins and carried off the ones I'd had the day before. Every day Lisette's god-mother sent me exactly the same dishes she cooked for her own family.

On Sunday I went to see her to say thank you. I spent the afternoon talking to her and playing with the children. As I stroked their blond heads I reflected that sometimes it was hard to know where one's duty lay. There was an appalling danger hanging over this family if those two maniacs still had the same ideas. The screws had only believed Girasolo's denunciation to the point of sending them to Saint-Joseph; not to the point of separating them. If I were to say they ought to be separated that would confirm the truth and seriousness of the first squeal. But how would the warders then react? It would be better to keep my mouth shut.

Arnaud and Hautin scarcely spoke to me in the hall. In any case I preferred to be on civil but not familiar terms with them. Jean Carbonieri didn't speak to me at all: he was angry because I hadn't joined his gourbi. Ours was made up of four men - Pierrot le Fou; Marquetti, who'd won the second prix de Rome for the violin and who often played for hours on end, which made me rather low; and Marsori, a Corsican from Sète.

I spoke to nobody about the abortive preparations for a mutiny on Royale, and I had the feeling that nobody here knew anything at all about it. Did they still have the same notions? They were all three working on a very disagreeable, laborious fatigue. They had to drag boulders along, hauling them with a kind of harness. These rocks were being used to make a swimming-pool in the sea. A boulder was well fastened with chains; another fifteen or twenty yards of chain was attached, and each convict, either to the right or the left, hooked on to this chain with an iron held in a harness round his chest and shoulders. Then, just like so many animals, they dragged the rock straight off to the place it was meant to be in. It was a very arduous job in the full sun; even more, it was a very disheartening one.

Shots from over by the quay – rifle, carbine and revolver shots. I knew what it was – those maniacs had started. What was happening? Who was winning? Sitting there in the hall I never stirred. All the convicts said, 'It's the mutiny!'

'Mutiny? What mutiny?' I meant to make it perfectly clear I knew nothing about it.

Jean Carbonieri hadn't gone to work that day: he came over to me, as pale as a corpse in spite of his sunburn. In a very low voice he said, 'It's the mutiny, Papi.' Coldly I said, 'What mutiny? I'm not in on this.'

The rifle fire continued. Pierrot le Fou came running into the hall. 'It's the mutiny, but I think they've failed. What bloody maniacs! Papillon, get out your knife. At least let's kill as many as possible before we're done for.'

'Yes,' said Carbonieri, 'let's kill as many as we can!'

Chissilia brought out a razor. Everyone had an open knife in his hand. I said, 'Don't be bloody fools. How many of us are there?'

'Nine.'

'Throw down your knives, seven of you. I'll kill the first man that threatens a screw. I don't want to get shot down in this room like a rabbit. Are you in this job, you?'

'No.'

'And you?'

'Nor me, either.'

'And you?'

'I knew nothing about it.'

'Good. None of us knew anything about this squares' mutiny. Do you get me?'

'Yes.'

'Anyone who feels like talking had better understand that he'll be killed the moment he admits he knew anything. Just like that. So there's nothing to be gained by being such a bastard as to split. Toss your knives into the pot. It won't be long before they're here.'

'And what if it's the lags who've won?'

'If it's the lags, then let them fix it so that their victory ends in a break. At that price, I want no part of it. What about you?'

'We don't, either,' said the eight others, including Jean Carbonieri.

As for me, I hadn't given a hint of what I knew – that is, that as the firing had stopped the lags must have lost. For the massacre they had planned couldn't have been over by this time.

The screws rushed into the camp like madmen, driving the fatigue party before them with blows from their rifle butts and sticks, kicking them, and shoving them into the next-door block. The warders trampled, smashed and chucked out everything in the way of guitars, mandolines, chessmen and draughts, lamps, little benches, bottles of oil, sugar, coffee, white clothes – they took their revenge on everything that was outside the rules. We heard two shots: certainly fired from a revolver.

There were eight buildings in the camp: they went through the lot in the same way, every now and then dealing out furious blows with their rifle-butts. One man came out stark naked, running towards the punishment block, battered without a pause by the screws who were taking him there.

Now they were in the building just over the way from us – the seventh. Ours was the only one left. There we were, all nine of us, each in his place. Not a single man who'd been out to work had come back. Everyone sat motionless. No one said a word. My throat was dry: I was thinking, 'Let's hope no God-damned fool takes advantage of this caper to shoot me down and get away with it.'

'Here they come,' said Carbonieri, more dead than alive with fright.

They rushed in, more than twenty of them, all with carbines or revolvers at the ready. 'What the hell?' bawled Filissari, 'not stripped yet? What are you waiting for, you rats? We're going to shoot the lot of you. Strip. We don't want to have to take your clothes off when you're corpses.'

'Monsieur Filissari ...'

'You shut your trap, Papillon. It's no good asking to be forgiven. 'What you planned was too wicked. And all of you in the tough block were part of it – that's for certain!' His eyes were starting out of his head; they were all bloodshot, and there was no mistaking the pure light of murder in them.

'We're for it,' said Pierrot.

I decided to stake everything on one throw. 'It astonishes me that a Napoleonist like you is going to literally murder innocent men. You're going to shoot? Fine: we don't want any speeches about it. Fire away. But for Christ's sake get it over quick. I'd thought you were a real man, old Filissari, a genuine Napoleonist: well, I got it wrong. But what the hell. I don't even want to see you when you fire: I turn my back on you. Brothers, turn your backs on these screws, so they can't say we were going to attack them.'

And moving like one man they all turned their backs. My attitude flabbergasted the screws, all the more so because (as we learnt afterwards) Filissari had just shot two poor bastards in the other blocks.

'Got anything else to say, Papillon?'

Still with my back turned I said, 'I don't believe a word of all this balls about a mutiny. Mutiny for what? To kill the screws? Then make a break? Where could you go? I'm an escaper, and I've come back from a thousand miles away – from Colombia. What country's going to take in escaped murderers, I ask you? What's the country called? Don't be bloody fools – there's no man worthy of the name that could possibly join in a plot like that.'

'Maybe not you, but what about Carbonieri? He's in it, I'm sure, because this morning Arnaud and Hautin were surprised he reported sick so as not to go to work.'

'That's just conjecture, I promise you.' I turned round and faced him. 'I'll tell you why this minute. Carbonieri's my friend: he knows every last thing about my break and so he can't nourish any illusions – he knows how an escape after a mutiny will end up, all right.'

At this point the governor appeared. He stayed outside. Filissari went out and the governor called, 'Carbonieri.'

'Here.'

'Take him to the black-hole without knocking him about. Warder So-and-So, go with him. Everyone outside: only head warders to stay. Bring in all the transportees scattered about the island. Don't kill anyone: bring every single man back to the camp.'

The governor walked into the hall, together with the deputy, Filissari and four screws. 'Papillon, something very serious has just happened,' said the governor. 'As the governor of this gaol I must assume a very grave responsibility. Before making certain arrangements I want some information right away. I know that you would have refused to talk to me in private at such a critical moment and that's why I've come here myself. Warder Duclos has been murdered. There's been an attempt at seizing the weapons in my house. That means mutiny. I've only a few minutes. I trust you: tell me your opinion.'

'If there'd been a mutiny, how could we possibly not have known about it? Why should nobody have told us? How many people are supposed to be involved? I'll give you the answers to these three questions, Governor, but first you must tell me how many men broke out after they'd killed the screw and, I imagine, taken his gun.'

'Three.'

'Who were they?'

'Arnaud, Hautin and Marceau.'

'I get it. Whatever you may think about it, there's been no mutiny.'

'You're lying, Papillon,' said Filissari. 'This mutiny was supposed to come off on Royale. Girasolo split, and we didn't believe him. Now we see that all he said was true. So you're double-crossing us, are you, Papillon?'

'Well then, if you're right, I'm an informer and so are Pierrot le Fou and Carbonieri and Galgani and all the Corsican bandits on Royale and all the rest of us. In spite of what's happened, I don't believe it. If there'd been a mutiny, the leaders would have been us: not anybody else.'

'What are you saying? You mean nobody else is involved at all? That's impossible.'

'Where are all these other mutineers? Who else but these three maniacs has stirred? Was there even a hint of action to take the post here, with only four armed guards in it, apart from Monsieur Filissari? How many boats are there on Saint-Joseph? Just one. One boat for six hundred men - does that make any sense? We're not complete, utter morons, are we? And then killing to make an escape! Even supposing there men did manage to get away, it would only mean being arrested and handed back from any country on earth. Governor, I don't know how many men you or your screws have killed so far, but I'm very nearly sure they were all innocent. And then what sense does it make, smashing every little thing we possess? It's natural you should be furious; but don't you forget that the day you deprive the convicts of the last scrap of pleasure in life, there may really be a mutiny – a mutiny of desperate men, a mass suicide, to kill for the sake of killing and be damned if we're killed too – everybody killed, screws and lags together. Monsieur Dutain, I've spoken in all sincerity: I think you deserve it, for the simple reason you came and asked us before taking your decisions. Leave us alone.'

'And what about the men who were in the plot?' said Filissari again.

'It's up to you to find them. We know nothing about it at all: we can't be any use to you whatsoever. I say it again – this whole thing is a piece of madness on the part of just one or two squares. We've nothing to do with it.'

'Monsieur Filissari,' said the governor, 'when the men come back into the dangerous block, have the door closed until further orders. Two warders on the door: no beating-up of the men and no destruction of their property. Come on.' And he left with the other screws.

Relief, relief. That was a very close thing. As he shut the door Filissari called out to me, 'It was lucky for you I'm a Napoleonist!'

In under an hour almost all the men belonging to our block were back. There were eighteen missing: the screws found that in their blind rush they'd shut them up in other blocks. When they were in with us again we learnt what happened, because these men belonged to the fatigue party. In a low voice a thief from Saint-Etienne told me about it. 'We'd dragged a boulder weighing close on a ton for about four hundred yards, Papi. The road we dragged it along had no very steep places, and we reached the well about fifty yards from the governor's house. We always stop there. It's in the shade of the coconut palms and it's the half-way mark. So there we were, stopping as usual, and someone hauled up a big bucket of cold water from the well: some people had a drink and others wetted their handkerchiefs to put them on their heads. It's always a ten minute halt, so the screw sat down too, resting on the edge of the well. He took off his sun helmet and he was wiping his forehead and the top of his head with a big handkerchief when Arnaud came up behind him with a hoe in his hand. He didn't raise it and so nobody shouted out to warn the screw. It didn't take Arnaud a second to whip it up and bring the blade down right on the middle of the screw's skull. The screw went down without a sound, his head cut in two. Hautin had been standing there quite naturally in front of him, and the instant he fell Hautin snatched his carbine while Marceau took off his belt with the revolver in it. Holding the revolver, Marceau turned to the whole party and said, "This is a mutiny. Those who're with us come on!" Not one of the turnkeys moved or said a word: not one of the men on the fatigue gave a sign of following. Arnaud looked at us all and he said, "You lousy cowards, we'll show you what men are!" He took the carbine from Hautin, and they both of them ran towards the governor's house. Marceau moved a little to one side and stood still. He had the heavy revolver in his hand and he said, "Don't move, don't talk, don't shout. You Arabs, face down on the ground." From where I was I could see everything that happened. Arnaud was going up the steps to the governor's house when the Arab who works there opened the door. He had the two little girls with him; he was holding one by the hand and carrying the other. Both Arnaud and the Arab were caught completely unawares: the Arab let fly a kick, still holding the kid in his arms. Arnaud was going to shoot the Arab, but the Arab shielded himself with the child. Nobody uttered a sound. Neither the Arab nor the others. Four or five times there was the carbine pointing at the Arab from different angles. Each time there was the kid held in front of the barrel. Without going up the steps, Hautin caught hold of the Arab's trousers from the side. As the Arab was just about to fall he flung the kid right on to Arnaud's carbine. Arnaud lost his balance, and he and the child and the Arab, thrown down by Hautin, all fell in a heap. Now there were the first cries — the children first, then the Arab, and then Arnaud and Hautin shouting insults. The Arab moved quickest and he snatched the fallen carbine, but he only got his left hand to the barrel. Hautin grabbed his leg again. Arnaud caught his right arm and twisted it. The Arab hurled the weapon a good ten yards from him.

'Just as all three were running to get it thei shot, fired by the screw in charge of the dry-leaf fatigue. The governor appeared at his window and fired shot after shot, but for fear of hitting the Arab he fired at the place where the carbine lay. Hautin and Arnaud ran in the direction of the camp, taking the sea road, followed by rifle shots. With his stiff leg, Hautin ran slower, and he was brought down before he reached the water. As for Arnaud, he went into the sea in the place between the pool we're building, and the screws' swimming-pool. It's always stiff with sharks there, you know. Arnaud was surrounded with shots, for another warder had come to the help of the governor and the dry-leaf screw. He sheltered behind a big rock.

"Surrender," shouted the screws. "Your life will be safe."

"Never," says Arnaud. "I'd rather the sharks ate me than have to put up with you swine any more."

'And he walked into the sea, straight towards the sharks. He must have been hit, because at one moment he stopped. But still the screws went on firing. He set off again, walking - not swimming. He wasn't even chest deep before the sharks went for him. We saw him hit one that came half out of the water to attack him. Then he was literally quartered as the sharks pulled from all sides without biting through his arms and legs. In less than five minutes he'd vanished.

'The screw fired at least a hundred shots at the swirling mass of Arnaud and the sharks. Only one shark was killed - it was washed up on the beach, belly in the air. Now that screws were coming in from every side, Marceau thought he'd save his life by throwing the revolver down the well; but the Arabs had got up, and hitting him with their sticks and kicking and punching him they drove him towards the screws, saying he was in the plot. Although he was covered with blood and had his hands up, the screws killed him with their revolvers and carbines, and to finish him off one of them smashed in his head, holding his rifle by the barrel and using the butt as a club.

'All the screws fired their revolvers into Hautin. There were thirty of them and they had six rounds apiece, so they hit him, living or dead, about a hundred and fifty times. The guys Filisari killed were ones the Arabs pointed out as having made a move to follow Arnaud at first and then having lost heart. All bloody lies, because even if there were any accomplices, no one moved a finger.'

We'd been shut up for two days now in our respective blocks. No one went outside to work. The sentries at the door were relieved every two hours. Other sentries between the blocks. No speaking from one block to another. No standing at the windows. You could only see into the yard by looking through the grill from the alley between the two rows of banimocks. Screws from Royale had arrived to reinforce Saint-Joseph. Not a single transportee outside. Nor an Arab turnkey. Everybody shut up. Now and then we'd see a naked man going to the punishment cells, followed by a warder - no shouts or blows. The screws often looked into the hall from the side windows. Two sentries on the door, one to the right and one to the left. Their turn of duty was short - only two hours - and they never sat down or slung their rifles: always had them at the ready.

We decided to play poker in little groups of five. No playing of the Marseilles game or any of the big, crowded versions - too much noise. Marquetti started playing a Beethoven sonata on his violin, but they made him stop.

'Stop that music: we screws are in mourning.'

There was a most unusual tension not only in the block but throughout the entire camp. No coffee: no soup. A hunk of bread in the morning, corned beef at noon and corned beef in the evening, one tin between four men. As nothing had been destroyed in our block, we had coffee and stores - butter, oil, flour, etc. The other blocks had nothing left. When the smoke rose up from the latrines, where there was a fire for our coffee, a screw shouted to us to put it out. It was an old boy from Marseilles, a lag called Niston, who was making the fire in order to sell it. He had the guts to reply, 'If you want the fire to be put out, mate, just come in and do it yourself.' Upon this the screw fired several shots through the window. The fire and the coffee were soon scattered.

Niston had a bullet in the leg. Everyone was so tense and angry we thought they were about to shoot us down and we lunged ourselves flat on the ground. It was still Filissari who was in charge of the guard at this time of day. He came tearing up like a maniac, his four screws with him. The screw who'd fired explained why - he came from the Auvergne. Filissari insulted him in Corsican, which the Auvergnats didn't understand. All he could say was, 'I don't follow

We got back into our hammocks. Niston's leg was bleeding. 'Don't say I'm wounded: they might finish me off outside.'

Filissari came up to the bars. Marquetti spoke to him in Corsican. 'Make your coffee. This won't happen again.' And he went off.

Niston was lucky. The bullet hadn't stayed in his flesh: it had gone in low down the muscle and had come out again half way up his leg. We put on a tourniquet, which stopped the blood, and then dressed the wound with vinegar.

'Papillon, outside.' It was eight o'clock, that is to say darkness had fallen. I didn't know the screw who was calling me - he must have been a Breton.

'Why should I go out at this time of night? There's nothing for me to do outside.'

'The governor wants to see you.'

'Then tell him to come here. I'm not going out.'

'You refuse?'

'Yes, I refuse.'

My friends stood round me, forming a circle. The screw was talking from the other side of the closed door. Marquetti went to the door and said, 'We shan't let Papillon out until the governor's here.'

'But it's the governor who's sending for him.'

'Tell him to come himself.'

An hour later two young screws appeared at the door. With them came the Arab who worked at the governor's house - the one who'd saved him and prevented the mutiny.

'Papillon, it's me, Mohamed. I've come to fetch you. The governor wants to see you: he can't come here.'

Marquetti said, 'Papi, that guy's got a carbine.'

At this I left the circle of my friends and walked over to the door. And in fact Mohamed did have a carbine under his arm. Now, I thought, I've seen everything: a convict in possession of a carbine!

'Come on,' said the Arab. 'I'm here to protect you if necessary.' But I didn't believe him. 'Come on; come with us.'

I went out. Mohamed walked by my side and the two screws came behind. I went to the command post. As I went through the guard-room at the camp gate Filissari said, 'Papillon, I hope you've nothing to say against me.'

'Neither me personally nor the others in the danger block. I don't know about anywhere else.'

We went down to the command post. The house and the quay were lit up with acetylene lamps that tried unsuccessfully to dispel the darkness all round. As we went Mohamed gave me a packet of Gauloises. We went into the brilliantly-lit room – two acetylene lamps – and sitting there I saw the governor of Royale, the deputy, the governor of Saint-Joseph, his deputy, and the governor of the Réclusion. Outside I'd noticed four Arabs, guarded by screws. Two of them I recognized as belonging to the party in question.

'Here's Papillon,' said the Arab.

'Good evening, Papillon,' said the governor of Saint-Joseph.

'Good evening.'

'Sit down. Take that chair over there.'

I sat down facing them all. The door of the room opened on to the kitchen, and I saw Lisette's godmother – she gave me a friendly wave.

'Papillon,' said the governor of Royale, 'Governor Dutain looks upon you as a man worthy of confidence, one who has redeemed himself by the attempted rescue of his wife's godchild. As for me, I only know you by our official reports, which describe you as really dangerous from every point of view. I'd rather forget the reports and rely on my colleague Dutain. Now a commission will undoubtedly come over here to make an inquiry, and the transportees of all categories will have to state what they know. It's certain that you and a few others have a great deal of influence over all the prisoners and that they'll follow your instructions to the letter. We'd like to know your opinion on the mutiny and also whether, to a greater or lesser extent, you can foresee what your block will save – yours in the first place and then the other ones.'

'For my part, I've nothing to say, nor can I influence what the others may say. If the commission comes to make a genuine inquiry in the present atmosphere, you're all done for – sacked.'

'What are you talking about, Papillon? The mutiny has been stopped by me and my colleagues.'

'You may be able to save your own skin; but the chiefs on Royale won't.'

'What do you mean?' The two governors of Royale started up and then sat down again.

'If you go on talking about a mutiny officially, you're all that warder is no better than a crawling murderer and at the time of the incident he was yellow with fright – he wanted to kill everybody including all of us in our block. If you accept these conditions, I'll fix it so that everyone says Arnaud, Hautin and Marceau behaved as they did so as to do the greatest possible amount of harm they could before being killed themselves. It was absolutely impossible to have foreseen what they were going to do. They had no accomplices: they told no one. What everyone will say is that these guys had made up their minds to commit suicide this way – to kill as many as they could before they were knocked on the head. It's suicide they were after. Now, if you like, I'll step into the kitchen and let you think it over before giving me your answer.'

I went into the kitchen and closed the door. Madame Dutain grasped my hand and gave me some coffee and brandy. Mohamed said, 'You didn't put in a word for me?'

'That's the governor's business. He's given you a gun, so obviously he means to have you pardoned.'

Lisette's godmother murmured to me, 'Well, those men from Royale have had what was coming to them.'

'Ha, ha! It was just too easy for them to say there was a mutiny on Saint-Joseph, and everyone knew all about it except for your husband.'

'Papillon, I heard everything, and I understood right away that you meant to take our side.'

'That's true, Madame Dutain.'

The door opened. 'Come in, Papillon,' said a screw.

'Sit down, Papillon,' said the governor of Royale. 'We've talked it over and we've come to the unanimous decision that you're certainly right. There was no mutiny. These three transportees had made up their minds to commit suicide, killing as many as possible first. So from tomorrow life will be as it was before. Monsieur Filissari is posted to Royale this very night. His case is our business and as far as he's concerned we don't ask for your collaboration. We rely upon you to keep your word.'

'You can count on me. Good-bye.'

'Mohamed and you two warders, take Papillon back to his block. Bring Filissari in: he's going back to Royale with us.'

On the way I told Mohamed I hoped he'd leave the island a free man. He thanked me.

'Well, and what did the screws want with you?'

Speaking clearly in that total silence I gave an exact, word-by-word account of what had happened. 'If there's anyone who doesn't agree or who thinks he's got anything to say against this arrangement I made with the screws for all of us, let him speak up.'

They all said they agreed. 'Do you think they believed no one else was involved?'

'No, but unless they want to be torpedoed they just have to believe it. And if we don't want trouble, we have to believe it too.'

At seven o'clock the next morning all the punishment cells were emptied. There were more than a hundred and twenty in them. No one went off to work, but all the buildings were open and the yard was full of convicts walking around perfectly free, talking, smoking, and sitting either in the sun or the shade as they chose. Niston had gone off to hospital. Carbonieri told me they'd put a label 'Suspected of being involved in the mutiny' on between eighty and a hundred of the cell doors.

Now that we were all together again, we learnt what had really happened. Filissari had only killed one man: the two others had been killed by young screws who were threatened by convicts - the men were cornered and thought they were going to be killed, so they drew their knives and charged, hoping to account for at least one before they were done for. And so that was how a genuine mutiny (which luckily failed at the very beginning) was turned into a strange kind of suicide on the part of three convicts: for that was the explanation officially accepted by everybody - by the prison service and by the prisoners alike. It left behind it a legend or a true story, I'm not sure which - probably something between the two.

It seems that the funeral of the three men killed in the camp and of Hautin and Marceau was carried out like this: since there was only one box with a trap for throwing the bodies into the sea, the screws laid them all in the bottom of the boat and tossed all five to the sharks at the same moment. They'd worked out that the first would have time to sink, the stones on their feet taking them down, while their friends were being eaten by the sharks. I was told that not a single one of these corpses had gone down but that all five had jiggled about on the surface just as the sun was setting, a shroud-white ballet, puppets jerked by the snouts and the tails of the sharks in a banquet worthy of Nebuchadnezzor. It was said that the horror of the sight was so great that the screws and lags fled before it.

A commission of inquiry came, staying nearly five days on Saint-Joseph and two on Royale. I wasn't singled out for questioning: I just went before it like the others. Through Governor Dutain I learnt that everything passed off well. Filissari was sent on leave until it should be time for him to retire: so he wouldn't be coming back. Mohamed was given a remission of the whole of his sentence. Governor Dutain was awarded an extra stripe.

There are always moaners, and yesterday a man from Bordeaux said to me, 'And what have we lags gained by fixing things for the screws?'

I looked at him and said, 'Not much. Just fifty or sixty convicts won't have to do five years solitary for complicity. Nothing much, is it, mate?'

The storm died away. There was a silent connivance between warders and prisoners that completely disoriented the inquiry: and maybe that was just what the commission wanted - everything to be settled peacefully.

As far as I myself was concerned I'd neither gained nor lost, apart from the fact that my friends were grateful to me for not having to undergo a severer discipline. Far from it - the authorities even did away with the dragging of boulders. That horrible fatigue was abolished. Now it was the buffaloes that did the pulling and the convicts that put the rocks into their places. Carbonieri went back to the bakery. For my part I too was trying to get back to Royale. For there was no workshop here on Saint-Joseph, and therefore it was impossible to make a raft.

Pétain's coming to power made the relations between the transportees and the warders worse. All the men belonging to the prison service said very loud and clear that they were Pétainists: so much so that one screw from Normandy said to me, 'Shall I tell you something, Papillon? I never really was a republican.'

No one had a radio on the islands and no one knew what was going on. What's more, it was said that we were providing supplies for German submarines at Martinique and Guadeloupe. There was no making head or tail of it. There were arguments and discussions all the time.

'Do you know what I think, Papi? This is the moment for us to have a mutiny, so as to hand over the islands to de Gaulle's Free French.'

'So you think Long Charlie wants a penal settlement? What for? Just tell me that, will you?'

'Why, to pick up two or three thousand men, of course.'

'Lepers, lunatics, consumptives, characters rotted with dysentery? You're a right comic, you are. That guy's not a bloody fool, cluttering himself up with convicts.'

'And what about the two thousand healthy men?'

'That's different. But just because they're men, does that mean they're any good as soldiers? Do you think war's the same as a hold-up? A hold-up lasts ten minutes: a war goes on for years and years. Patriotic fervour, that's what you need to be a good soldier. And whatever you may say, I don't see a single guy here who'd want to give his life for France.'

'And why should anybody, after what France has done for us?'

'There you are - you've admitted I was right. Fortunately Charlie has other people apart from you to carry on the war. But still and all, when I think of those lousy Germans in our country ...! And when you think there are Frenchmen who go along with the Huns! Every single screw here, every last one, says he's for Pétain.'

The Comte de Bérac said, 'It would be one way of redeeming oneself.' And now there happened something very extraordinary - there wasn't a soul among us who'd ever spoken of redeeming himself, but now all of a sudden everybody, crooks and squares, all these poor bloody convicts, saw a gleam of hope.

'What do you say to having this mutiny, Papillon, so de Gaulle should take us under his orders?'

'I'm very sorry, but I don't have to redeem myself in the eyes of anyone on God's earth. As for French justice and its piece about "rehabilitation" - my arse. I'll be the one to say when I'm rehabilitated. My duty is to go off on a break and then once I'm free, to be an ordinary citizen living in society without being a danger to it. I don't believe a guy can prove anything else any other way. Still, I'm ready for anything at all that'll lead to a break. Handing over the islands to Long Charlie doesn't interest me and I'm dead certain it doesn't interest him either. Anyhow, do you know what the characters in power will say if you bring off a stroke of that kind? They'll say you took the islands just to be free, not to strike a blow for Free France. And then again, do you guys really know which is right, de Gaulle or Pétain? I don't. I know absolutely nothing about it. I suffer like a poor miserable bastard at knowing that my country's invaded: I think about my people, my relatives, my sisters, my nieces.'

'We'd have to be a right set of twats, though, to worry ourselves sick about a society that's never had the least pity on us.'

'But it's natural that one should; because the cops and all the French legal machinery and these gendarmes and screws, that's not France. They're a class apart, made up of people with completely twisted minds. How many of them are ready to go into the service of the Germans at this minute? You can bet your bottom dollar the French police are arresting their own countrymen and handing them over to the German authorities. Right. I've said it once and I'll say it again, I'll have nothing to do with a mutiny, whatever it's for. Except for a break. But how and when?'

There were very serious arguments between the two sides. One lot were for de Gaulle and the others were for Pétain. When it came down to brass tacks nobody really knew anything, because as I've said there was no radio, either among the lags or among the screws. News reached us by the boats that called in, leaving us a little flour, dried vegetables and rice: The war, seen from such a great way off, was hard for us to understand.

It was said that a man had come to Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni, recruiting for the Free French. Here in penal we knew nothing, only that the Germans were all over France by now.

One amusing thing happened: a priest came to Royale and after mass he gave a sermon. He said, 'If the islands are attacked, you'll be given weapons to help the warders defend French soil.' That's perfectly true. He was a splendid man, that curé; and he must have had a wonderfully low opinion of us. Asking prisoners to defend their own cells! God above, we really had seen everything in penal!

As far as we were concerned, the war amounted to this - twice the number of screws, everything doubled, all the way from simple screw right up to governor and chief warder; a great many inspectors, some with a very strong German or Alsatian accent; very little bread – fourteen ounces; very little meat. In a word, there was only one thing that had gone up, and that was the penalty for a botched escape – death-sentence and execution. For added to the accusation of escape there was 'Attempted to join the enemies of France.'

I had been on Royale for nearly four months. I had made a great friend, Dr. Germain Guibert. His wife, a wonderful person, asked me to make her a kitchen garden to help them live on this wretched diet. I made her a plot with lettuces, radishes, haricots, tomatoes and aubergines. She was delighted and she treated me as a real friend.

This doctor had never shaken a warder's hand, whatever his rank; but he often did so with me and some other convicts he'd come to know and respect.

When at last I had become a free man once more I got into touch with Dr. Germain Guibert again through Dr. Rosenberg. He sent me a photo of himself and his wife on the Canebière in Marseilles. He was coming back from Morocco, and he congratulated me on being free and happy. He was killed in Indo-China, trying to save a wounded man who had been left behind. He was an exceptional person and he had a wife worthy of him. When I was back in France in 1967 I wanted to go and see her. But I gave up the idea, because she had stopped writing to me after I'd asked for a testimonial. She had sent it, but since then I'd never heard from her. I don't know the reason for this silence, but in my heart I still have the utmost gratitude to both of them for the way they treated me in their home on Royale.

A few months later I was able to get back to Royale.

Carbonieri's Death

Yesterday my friend Matthieu Carbonieri was stabbed clean through the heart. This killing started off a series of others. He was in the wash-house, quite naked, having a shower; and it was when his face was covered with soap that he was stabbed. When you had a shower it was usual to open your knife and lay it under your things, so as to have just time to get it if anyone who looked like an enemy suddenly appeared. The neglect of this little precaution cost him his life. The man who'd killed my mate was an Armenian, a life-long ponce.

With the governor's permission. I carried my friend down to the quay myself, helped by another man. He was heavy and going down the hill I had to rest three times. I attached a big stone to his feet, using wire instead of rope. That way the sharks wouldn't be able to bite through it, and he'd go down without their eating him.

The bell tolled and we reached the wharf. It was six o'clock in the evening. We got into the boat. The sun was touching the horizon. There under the lid of the well-known box that was used for everybody lay Matthieu, sleeping for ever. For him everything was over.

'Right, give way,' said the screw at the tiller. In under ten minutes we reached the current formed by the run between Royale and Saint-Joseph. And then all at once there was a great lump in my throat. Dozens of shark-fins appeared above the surface, cruising swiftly in an area not more than a few hundred yards wide. Here they were, the contract shark-takers, at the rendezvous on time.

God willing they wouldn't have time to raise their heads at my friend. We raised our oars to say farewell. The boat was pulled back. Wrapped in flour sacks, Matthieu's body slipped off the weight of the heavy stone, and in a moment he was in the sea.

Horror! It had just touched and I thought it was vanishing when it was heaved right up in the air by God knows how many sharks – seven, ten, twenty – there was no telling. Before the boat could get away the flour sacks were ripped off; and then something incomprehensible happened. Matthieu showed there for two or three seconds, standing upright in the water. His right forearm had already gone. With half his body above the surface he came straight for the boat, and then, in the midst of a still stronger swirl, he disappeared for ever. The sharks passed under the boat, thumping the bottom so that one man lost his balance and nearly fell into the water.

All of us, including the screws, were horror-struck. For the first time in my life I wanted to die. I was very close to throwing myself to the sharks, so as to leave this hell for good and all.

Slowly I walked up from the wharf to the camp. No one with me. I put the stretcher over my shoulder and I reached the flat place where my buffalo Brutus went for Danton. I stopped and sat down. Night had fallen although it was only seven. In the west the sky was still faintly lit by a few gleams from the sunken sun. All the rest was black, with the beam of the light-house piercing the darkness every now and then: my heart was full.

What the hell, you wanted to see a funeral, and your best friend's funeral into the bargain? Well, you've seen it, all right, all right. You heard the bell. Have you had enough, brother? Is your unhealthy curiosity satisfied?

The guy who did it – you've still got him to take apart. When? Tonight. Why tonight? It's too early: the guy will be absolutely on tip-toe. They are ten in his gaurdi. Still, you mustn't be beaten to the mark. How many men can I count on, now? Four, and then there's me: five. That's all right. Wipe this guy out. Yes: and if possible I'll get away to Devil's Island. No rafts there, no preparations, nothing: just two sacks of coconuts and I jump into the sea. The distance to the coast is fairly short – twenty-five miles as the crow flies. What with waves, winds and tides, that would probably turn into seventy-five. It would only be a question of holding out. I was strong, and two days at sea, astride my sack – why, I ought to be able to cope with that.

I shouldered the stretcher and went up to the camp. When I reached the gate a very extraordinary thing happened: I was searched. That never happened: not ever. The screw himself took my knife.

'Are you trying to get me killed? What am I being disarmed for? Don't you know you're sending me to my death, doing this? If I'm killed, it'll be your fault.' No one replied, neither the screws nor the Arab turnkeys. The door was opened and I walked into the hall. 'You can't see a thing in here. Why's there only one lamp instead of three?'

'Papi, come over here.' Grandet pulled me by the sleeve. There was not much noise in the room. You could feel something serious was just going to happen, or had just that moment happened.

'I've not got my knife any more. They searched me and took it away.'

'You won't need it tonight.'

'Why not?'

'The Armenian and his friend are in the latrines.'

'What are they doing there?'

'They're dead.'

'Who put the chill on them?'

'I did.'

'That was quick. What about the others?'

'There are four left in their gourbi. Paulo gave me his sacred word they wouldn't stir but would wait to know whether you agree that the business should stop here.'

'Give me a knife.'

'Here's mine. I'll stay in this corner: you go and speak to them.'

I walked towards their gourbi. My eyes were used to the dimness now. I could make them out quite clearly. There they stood, the four of them, close together, side by side in front of their hammocks.

'You want to talk to me, Paulo?'

'Yes.'

'Alone or with your friends here? What do you want with me?' I left a prudent five feet between us. I had the knife open in my left hand with its hilt right there in my palm.

'I wanted to tell you it seems to me your friend has been properly revenged - that this is enough. You've lost your best friend: we've lost two of ours. As I see things, it's time to stop here. What do you think?'

'Paulo, I hear what you say. If you would be for the two goubis to promise not to make a move for a week. By then we'd know what ought to be done. Right?

'Right.'

And I withdrew.

'Well, what did they say?'

'That they thought the death of the Armenian and Sans-Souci revenge enough for Matthieu.'

'No,' said Galgani. Grandet said nothing. Jean Castelli and Louis Graven were in favour of a peace agreement. 'What about you, Papi?'

'In the first place, who killed Matthieu? The Armenian. Right. I've suggested an agreement. I've given my word and they've given theirs that none of us will stir for a week.'

'So you don't want to revenge Matthieu?' said Galgani.

'Matthieu's revenged already: two men have been killed for him. Why kill the others?'

'Were they even in on what was going to happen? That's what we ought to find out.'

'Good night, everyone. You must excuse me - I'm going to try to get some sleep.'

In any case I felt I had to be alone, and I stretched out on my hammock. I felt a hand gliding gently over me and taking the knife. A low voice in the darkness. 'Sleep if you can, Papi: sleep easy. We're going to keep watch, turn and turn about.'

There had been no real sound reason for my friend's sudden, violent, disgusting death. The Armenian had killed him just because during the gambling the night before Matthieu had compelled him to pay a bet of a hundred and seventy francs. The bleeding fool thought he'd lost face because he'd had to obey in front of the thirty or forty other men in the game. Wedged there between Matthieu and Grandet he'd had no choice about it.

In that back-handed, cowardly way he had killed a man who was the very best example of the pure adventurer, clean and straight in his own particular world. It wounded me deeply, and the only satisfaction I had was that the killers had survived their crime by no more than a few hours. A precious small satisfaction.

Grandet, moving like a tiger, had stabbed them in the throat, one after the other, before they had had time to defend themselves - he had thrust with the speed of an expert fencer. It occurred to me that the place where they had fallen must be swimming with blood. Stupidly I thought, 'I should like to ask who dragged them off to the latrine.' But I could not bring myself to speak. Behind my closed eyes I could see the tragic red and violet sunset, its last gleams lighting up the Dantesque scene of the sharks fighting over my friend . . . And that upright trunk, the right forearm already gone, advancing towards the boat! So it was true that the bell called the sharks and that the swine knew they were going to be fed when it began to toll . . . Once again I saw those scores of fins – the sombre gleam as they cruised, circling round and round like submarines. There were certainly more than a hundred of them . . . For my friend it was all over: the way down the drain had done its job right through to the end.

To be stabbed to death over a trifle at the age of forty! Poor Matthieu. I couldn't bear it any more. No. No. No. I was quite happy to have the sharks eat me, but alive, making a dash for freedom, with no flour sacks, stone and rope. No spectators, either screws or convicts. No bell. If I was to be eaten, fine; but let them get me down alive, struggling against the sea and sky to reach the mainland.

'It's over – finished. No more too-carefully-prepared escapes. Devil's Island, two sacks of coconuts and have it away – let everything rip and trust in God.'

After all, it would only be a question of my holding out. Forty-eight hours or sixty? Would such a long time in the water, together with the muscular effort of holding myself astride on the sacks, paralyse me at some point? If I was lucky enough to get to Devil's Island I'd try the experiment. The first thing to do was to get off Royale and be sent to Devil's Island. Then I'd see.

'Are you asleep, Papi?'

'No.'

funeral there with the sharks was even worse. It was hideous. Do you know that?’

‘Don’t tell me, Papi; I can imagine what it must have been like. You should never have gone.’

‘I thought the stuff about the bell was all balls. And then with the heavy stone held by wire I’d never have believed the sharks would have had time to catch him as he sank. Poor old Matthieu: I’ll see that horrible sight as long as I live. And what about you – how did you manage to wipe out the Armenian and Sans-Souci so quickly?’

‘I was at the far end of the island, fixing an iron door at the slaughterhouse when I heard they’d killed our friend. It was midday. Instead of going up to the camp I went back to work, saying I had to see to the lock. I managed to fit a two-edged blade into a tube a yard long. Both the tube and the handle of the knife were hollowed out. I went back to the camp at five, carrying the tube. The screw asked me what it was and I said the wooden bar of my hammock had broken, so for that night I was going to use this tube. It was still daylight when I went into the hall, but I left the tube in the wash-house. I picked it up before roll-call. It began to grow dark. With our friends standing round me I quickly fitted the blade on to the tube. The Armenian and Sans-Souci were standing in their part of the room, in front of their hammocks; Paulo was a little way behind them. Jean Castelli and Louis Gravon are very good guys, as you know: but they’re old and they aren’t quick enough for a set battle of this kind. I wanted to do it before you came back, so that you shouldn’t be mixed up in it. If we were caught, with your record you’d have risked the maximum. Jean went down to the far end of the hall and put out one of the lights: Gravon did the same at the top end. With just the one in the middle, there was almost no light in the room. I had a big electric torch that Dega had given me. Jean walked in front, me behind him. When we reached them he raised his arm and shone the torch in their faces. The Armenian was dazzled and he lifted his left arm to his eyes: there was time to get him in the throat with my lance. Sans-Souci was dazzled next and he stabbed out in the air in front of him. I hit him so hard with my blade I went right through and out the other side. Paulo flung himself flat on the ground and rolled under the hammocks. As Jean had turned off the torch I didn’t go after him – that’s what saved Paulo.

'Who dragged them off to the latrines?'

'I don't know. I think it was the other men of their gourbi, so as to get the chargers out of their guts.'

'But there must have been a hell of a great pool of blood.'

'You're telling me there was a hell of a great pool of blood. Their throats were cut through and through, and they must have spilled every last drop of juice they had. I had the idea of the torch while I was getting the lance ready. In the workshop there was a screw, changing the batteries in his. That gave me the notion and I got into touch with Dega at once, making him let me have one. They can make a full-blown search if they like. The torch has been taken out and given back to Dega by an Arab turnkey: the knife, too. So no leaks as far as those things are concerned. I've no regrets. They killed our friend when he had his eyes full of soap: I helped them to commit suicide when their eyes were full of light. We're quits. What do you think about it, Papi?'

'You did splendidly, and I don't know how to thank you for having revenged our friend so soon: and for having had the idea of keeping me out of the whole business, too.'

'Think nothing of it. I did my duty: you've had such a bad time and you so desperately want to be free, I just had to do it.'

'Thank you, Grandet. Yes, I want to get out more than ever now. Will you help me to fix things so this business stops here? To tell you the truth, I'd be very surprised if the Armenian had told his gourbi before he killed Matthieu. Paulo would never have put up with such a cowardly murder. He would have known what it would lead to.'

'I'm of the same opinion. Only Galgani says they're all guilty.'

'We'll see what happens at six. I won't go out to work. I'll pretend to be ill so as to stay.'

Five in the morning. The block leader came over to us. 'Do you guys think I ought to call the guard? I've just found two stiffs in the latrine.' This chap, an old lag of seventy, was trying to make us, us, believe he hadn't noticed a thing since half-past six yesterday evening, the time the chill had been put on them. The hall must have been covered with them because as men walked to and fro they must necessarily have stepped in the pool, which was right there in the middle of the alley.

det replied just as cunningly as the old boy. 'What stiffs in the latrine? Since when?'
rch me,' said the old lag. 'I've been asleep since six. It ly just now, when I went to have a piss, that I slipped e sticky mess. I lit my lighter, saw it was blood, and then nd the characters there in the latrine.'
all them, and we'll see what they say.'
Warders! Warders!'
What are you bawling for, you old brute? Is the block on
?'

No, Chief: there are two stiff in the bogs.'
'Well, what do you want me to do about it? Bring them ack to life? It's a quarter past five now: at six we'll have a ook. Stop anyone going into the latrine.'

'That's just not possible. Now, just when everybody's get ting up, everyone goes to have a piss or a shit.'
'True enough. Wait a minute - I'll tell the boss.'
They appeared: three screws, one chief warder and two others. We thought they were going to come in, but no, they stayed there at the barred door.

'You say there are two dead men in the latrine?'
'Yes, Chief.'
'Since when?'
'I don't know. I found them just now, when I went to hav a piss.'

'Who are they?'
'I don't know.'

'Oh all right, you old lunatic, I'll tell you. One of them's the Armenian. Go and have a look.'
'You're quite right: it's the Armenian and Sans-Souci.'
'Good. We'll wait for the roll-call.' And they went off.
Six o'clock and the first bell. The door opened. The two coffee men hurried along, followed by the ones with the bread.
Half past six and the second bell. Day had broken and the alley was covered with the footprints of the men who walked in the blood during the night.

The two governors appeared. It was full daylight. El warders and the doctor with them.
'Everyone strip! Stand to attention in front of your h mocks. It's an absolute slaughter-house - there's blood e where!'

The deputy-governor was the first to go into the la

When he came out again he was as white as a sheet. 'Their throats have been literally ripped out. Nobody heard or saw anything, of course?'

Total silence.

'You're the block leader, old man: these men are stiff. Doctor, about how long have they been dead?'

'Eight to ten hours,' said the medico.

'And you only found them at five? You never saw or heard anything?'

'No. I'm hard of hearing and I can scarcely see: what's more I'm seventy years old - forty of them in penal. So I sleep a lot, you see. I was asleep by six, and it was only because I wanted to piss that I woke up at five. It was a bit of luck, because ordinarily I sleep until the bell.'

'You're right, it was a bit of luck,' said the governor ironically. 'It was a bit of luck for us, too, because this way everybody's slept peacefully all night through, both warders and prisoners. Stretcher-bearers, pick up these two corpses and carry them off to the operating room. I'd like you to do a post-mortem, Doctor. And you people, get out one by one into the yard, naked.'

Each one of us filed past the governor and the doctor. The men were very closely examined all over. No one had a wound: several had splashes of blood. They said they'd slipped, going to the latrines. Grandet, Galgani and I were inspected more attentively than the others.

'Papillon, which is your place?' They searched all my possessions. 'Where's your knife?'

'The warder on the gate took it from me at seven yesterday evening.'

'That's true,' said the screw. 'He cut up very rough, saying we wanted him to be killed.'

'Grandet, is this knife yours?'

'Why, yes: it was in my place, so it must be mine.' He looked at the knife very carefully: it was as clean as a new pin - not a spot anywhere.

The medico came out of the latrine and said, 'It was a double-edged dagger that was used to cut these men's throats. They were killed standing up. It's incomprehensible. A convict doesn't just stand there like a rabbit, without defending himself, while his throat is cut. Someone must have been wounded.'

'And yet as you can see for yourself, Doctor, no man here has so much as a scratch.'

'Were these two men dangerous?'

'Very dangerous indeed, Doctor. The Armenian was certainly the man who killed Carbonieri in the wash-house at nine yesterday morning.'

'Investigation closed,' said the governor. 'Still, keep Grandet's knife. Everybody out to work, except for the invalids. Papillon, you reported sick?'

'Yes, Governor.'

'You lost no time in revenging your friend. I'm not taken in, you know. Unfortunately I've no proofs and I know I shan't get any. For the last time, has anyone any statement to make? If there is one of you who can shed any light on this double crime, I give my word he'll be un-interned and sent to the mainland.'

Dead silence.

The whole of the Armenian's gourbi reported sick. Seeing this, Grandet, Galgani, Jean Castelli and Louis Gravon also put themselves on the list at the last moment. The room was emptied of its hundred and twenty men. There remained the five of my gourbi and the four of the Armenian's, together with the watchmaker, the block leader, grumbling continually about all the cleaning he was going to have to do, and two or three other convicts, of whom one was an Alsatian called Big Sylvain.

This was a man who lived all by himself in penal: everyone liked him. He was a highly respected man of action, and it was a most uncommon feat that had sent him down for twenty years. Single-handed, he attacked the mail van on the Paris-Brussels express, knocked out the two men in charge and tossed the mail sacks on to the ballast; they were picked up by accomplices along the line and they brought in a handsome sum.

Sylvain saw the two gourbis whispering, each in a different corner, and as he didn't know we'd agreed not to make a move, he went so far as to take it upon himself to speak. 'I hope you're not going to fight a pitched battle - a Three Musketeers kind of job?'

'Not today,' said Galgani. 'That'll be for later.'

'How come later? Never put off for tomorrow what you can do today,' said Paulo. 'But for my part I can't see any reason why we should kill one another. What do you think, Papillon?’

‘One single question: did you know what the Armenian was going to do?’

‘On my word as a man, Papi, we knew nothing: and if you want to know, I’m not sure – if the Armenian wasn’t dead – whether I should have put up with what he did.’

‘Well, if that’s how it is, why not let’s stop the whole thing for good?’ said Grandet.

‘That’s what we think. Let’s shake hands and say no more about this wretched business.’

‘OK.’

‘I’m the witness,’ said Sylvain. ‘I’m truly glad it’s over.’

‘Let’s say no more.’

At six that evening the bell began to toll. Hearing it, I could not prevent myself from seeing yesterday once again: my friend rushing towards the boat with half his body reared out of the water. The picture was so striking, so shocking, even twenty-four hours later, that not for a moment could I hope that the Armenian and Sans-Souci were being treated so by the sharks.

Galgani said not a word. He knew very well what had happened to Carbonieri. Swinging his legs as he sat astride his hammock, he stared into emptiness. Grandet was not back yet. The tolling had been over for a good ten minutes ~~when~~ without looking at me, Galgani, still swinging his legs, said in an undertone, ‘I hope none of the sharks that ate Mathieu got so much as a scrap of that Armenian sod. It would be too bloody silly for them to have been dead ~~against~~ one another in life and then to come together in a shark’s belly.’

The loss of that true, great-hearted friend was going to mean a dreadful gap in my life. It would be better for me to get off Royale as soon as possible and start moving. That’s what I said to myself over and over again every day.

'Since there's a war on and the punishment for a bungled escape is so much heavier, this isn't a time to muck up a break, Salvidia. Right?' The Italian with the gold charger and I were talking by the wash-house: we'd just re-read the poster that announced the new regulations in case of escape. I went on, 'Yet it's not the risk of being sentenced to death that'll stop me going. What about you?'

'As far as I'm concerned, Papillon, I just can't take it any more and I want to make a break. However it ends. I've asked to be taken on in the lunatic asylum as an attendant. I know there are two drums in the asylum dispensary; they hold fifty gallons apiece, so they are plenty big enough to make a raft. One's full of olive-oil and the other of vinegar. It seems to me that if we lashed them together so that they couldn't possibly come apart, there would be a very fair chance of reaching the mainland. There's no watch kept on the outside of the walls round the asylum. On the inside there's only one medical warder on guard at any time, with some convicts to help him keep watch on the lunatics. Why don't you join me up there?'

'As an attendant?'

'Impossible, Papillon. You know very well they'd never give you a job in the asylum. It's far from the camp; it's not heavily guarded – there's everything against sending you there. But you might get in as a patient.'

'That would be very tricky, Salvidia. When the doctor puts you down as cracked, what he's giving you is nothing more nor less than the right to do whatever you like without being held responsible. It's officially admitted that you aren't answerable. Do you realize the responsibility he takes upon himself when he signs that kind of a certificate? You can kill a convict, or even a screw or a screw's wife, or a child if you like. You can escape – you can commit any crime you can think of and the law has no hold on you. The very worst it can do is to put you into a padded cell with nothing on except a strait-jacket. And even that can only go on for a certain period: in time they have to let up. The result is that however serious your crime, escapes included, you don't pay the penalty.'

'Papillon, I believe in you: you're the man I'd really like to make a break with. Do everything you possibly can to join me as a lunatic. Being an attendant I'll be able to help you bear it - I'll be able to give you a hand when things are tough. I admit it must be horrible to find yourself among all those very dangerous creatures when you're not mad yourself.'

'You go on up to the asylum, Romeo. I'll look thoroughly into the whole thing; and above all I'll find out about the first signs of madness so as to convince the doc. In any case, it's not at all a bad idea to get myself certified as irresponsible.'

I began studying the question seriously. There was no book on the subject in the prison library. Whenever I had an opportunity I talked about it with men who had been ill for quite a time and gradually I formed a fairly clear notion.

1. All lunatics have agonizing pains in the back of the head.

2. They often have a humming in their ears.

3. They are very much on edge, so can't stay lying in the same position for long without having a nervous explosion that wakes them up, their whole body jerking, tensed to the breaking-point.

So what I had to do was to have someone find out I had these symptoms, rather than me speaking of them directly. I was to be just mad enough to force the doctor to put me into the asylum, but not so mad, not so violently mad, as to justify ill-treatment by the warders - strait-jackets, beating-up, reduced diet, bromide injections, cold or boiling baths, etc. If I did the act well enough I ought to be able to come it over the doctor.

There was one thing in my favour - what reason could I possibly have for swinging the lead? As the doctor would find no answer to that question, it was likely that I should win the game. There was no other way out for me. They had refused to send me to Devil's Island. Now that my friend Matthieu had been murdered I could no longer bear the camp. To hell with hesitation! My mind was made up. I'd get myself on the sick-list on Monday. It would be better if someone else reported me sick, someone who would speak in good faith. I'd have to behave abnormally inside the block now and then. Then the block leader would speak to the screw and the screw himself would put me down on the list.

For three days now I had not slept: I no longer washed or shaved. I masturbated several times every night and I ate very little. Yesterday I asked my neighbour why he'd taken a non-existent photo from my place. That made him uneasy and he moved elsewhere. The soup often stood for a few minutes in the tub before it was distributed. I went over to the tub, and there in front of everybody I pissed into it. That cast something of a damper on the room, but I dare say my look discouraged them, because no one made any objection. Only my friend Grandet said, 'Papillon, what did you do that for?'

'Because they forgot to salt it.' And without paying any attention to the others I went and fetched my bowl, holding it out to the block leader to be filled. There was a dead silence, and they all watched me as I ate my soup.

These two happenings brought me up in front of the doctor this morning without any asking on my part.

'Well, Doctor, are you all right? Yes or no?' I repeated my question. The doctor looked at me, amazed. I fixed him with a studiously natural stare.

'Yes, I'm all right,' said the doctor. 'But what about you? Are you sick?'

'No.'

'Then why are you on the list?'

'No reason at all: they told me you were ill. I'm glad to see it wasn't true. Good-bye.'

'Just a minute, Papillon. Sit down there, opposite me. Look into my face.' And the medico examined my eyes with a little torch that threw a narrow beam.

'Did you see any of the things you thought you were going to find, Doc? Your light isn't very strong, but even so I think you know what I mean. Tell me, did you see them?'

'See what?' said the medico.

'Don't be such a bloody fool. Are you a doctor or a vet? Don't you tell me you didn't have time to see them before they hid - either you don't want to tell me, or you take me for a genuine twat.' My eyes were shining with tiredness. I was unwashed and unshaved, and my appearance told in my favour. The screws were listening, fascinated; but I didn't make the slightest violent gesture that would let them step in. The doctor, soothing me and jollying me along so that I shouldn't get excited, stood up and put his hand on my shoulder. I was still sitting down.

'Yes, I didn't like to tell you, Papillon, but I did have time to see them.'

'You're lying, Doc, lying like a real member of the colonial. You didn't see anything at all! What I thought you were looking for was those three little black specks in my left eye. I can only see them when I look at nothing or when I'm reading. But when I take a mirror I can see my eye quite clearly, without the least trace of the three specks. They hide the second I get hold of the glass to look at them in.'

'Send him to hospital,' said the medico. 'Take him there at once: he's not to go back to the camp. You tell me you're not sick, Papillon? Maybe you're right, but I think you're very tired and so I'm going to give you a few days rest in hospital. You'd like that?'

the Match you lent me. But as for sleeping, that's something else again. Because, do you see, behind my cell there's a pump. It's there for watering something or other, I dare say, but the thump-thump-thump all night gets into the back of my head, and it's just as though there was a thump-thump-thump echoing inside my skull. All night it goes on. Unbearable. So I'd be very grateful if you'd have my cell changed.'

The doctor turned towards the medical warder and quickly whispered, 'Is there a pump?' The warder shook his head. 'Change his cell, warder. Where do you want to go, Papillon?'

'As far as possible from that bloody pump – right to the end of the corridor. Thank you, Doctor.'

The door closed; I was alone in my cell again. I caught the very faintest hint of a sound – I was being watched through the judas. It was certainly the doctor, because I had not heard their steps going away after they left the cell. So I quickly shook my fist at the wall with the imaginary pump behind it and called out – but not too loud – 'Stop it, stop it, you drunken bastard! Are you going to go on watering your garden for ever, you ugly sod?' And I lay down in my bed with my head buried under the pillow.

I didn't catch the little sound of the brass lid closing over the judas, but I did hear footsteps going away. So the character at the spy-hole was certainly the doctor.

That afternoon they changed my cell. I must have made the right impression in the morning, because just to take me the few yards to the end of the corridor there were two screws and two convict orderlies. As they didn't speak to me, I didn't speak to them either. I merely followed them without a word. Two days later, the second symptom – noises in my ears.

'How are you, Papillon? Have you finished the magazine I sent you?'

'No, I've not read it. I spent all day and half the night trying to smother a mosquito or a little fly that's living in my ear. I shove in cotton wool, but it does no good. Their humming goes on and on – bzz-bzz-bzz. And it not only tickles, but it never stops buzzing. It gets you down in the end, Doctor. What do you think about it? Maybe, since I haven't managed to smother them we might try drowning them? What do you say?'

My mouth went on jerking all this time and I saw he took notice of it. He took my hand and looked straight into my eyes. I could feel he was concerned and worried. 'Yes, Papillon, we'll drown them. Chatal, syringe his ears.'

We had these scenes every morning with variations, but it didn't look as though the doctor could make up his mind to send me to the asylum. When he was giving me a bromide injection Chatal said, 'It's all right for the moment. The doc's badly shaken, but it may still take him a long time before he sends you to the asylum. If you want him to make up his mind quick, show him you can be dangerous.'

'How are you, Papillon?' The doctor, accompanied by the medical warders and Chatal, greeted me kindly as he opened my cell door.

'Hold your horses, Doc.' My whole attitude was aggressive. 'You know damn well I'm sick. And I'm beginning to wonder whether you aren't in with the sod who's torturing me.'

'Who's torturing you? When? How?'

'Listen, Doc, in the first place do you know the work of Dr. d'Arsonval?'

'I should hope so.'

'Then you know he's invented a multiple-wave oscillator to ionize the air round a patient with duodenal ulcers. This oscillator sends electric currents. Right: well an enemy of mine knocked off one of these machines in the Cayenne hospital. Every time I'm really asleep, he presses on the button and the current gets me smack in the belly and thighs. I jerk out straight, and my whole body jumps six inches into the air. How do you expect me to resist that and go on sleeping? It went on all last night. I scarcely close my eyes and the current hits me. My whole body jerks like a spring being released. I can't bear it any more, Doc. Just you tell them all that if I find anyone helping that sod, I'll take him to pieces. I've no weapons, but I'm strong enough to strangle any man on earth. And if the cap fits, wear it. And you can stuff up your hypocritical good mornings and how are you Papillon. I'll be here again, Doc, just you hold your horses.'

This scene paid off. Chatal told me the doctor ~~sent~~ the screws to be very careful. To never open my door. There were two or three of them and to always speak to me. 'He's got persecution,' said the doctor. 'We'll get you to the asylum as quick as possible.'

Chatal, meaning to spare me being put into a strait-jacket, had said, 'I believe I could undertake to lead him to the asylum with just one warder.'

'Well, Papi, have you had a good dinner?'

'Yes, Chatal, it was fine.'

'Would you like to come with me and Monsieur Jeannus?'

'Where to?'

'We're just going up to the asylum to take them some medical stores: it would make a little walk for you.'

'OK. Let's go.' And we all three went out of the hospital and took the asylum road. Chatal kept on talking as we went along, and then, when we were almost there, he said, 'Aren't you sick of the camp, Papillon?'

'Oh, yes, I'm fed up with it, particularly since my friend Carbonieri's no longer there.'

'Then why don't you stay in the asylum for a few days? That way maybe the character with the electric machine won't be able to find you to send the current.'

'Well, that's an idea, mate. But do you think they'd take me in, me not being sick in the head?'

'You leave that to me: I'll put in a word for you,' said the screw, quite delighted at seeing me fall into Chatal's so-called trap.

So to cut it short, here I was in the asylum together with a hundred lunatics. It was no fun at all, living with madmen. We exercised in the yard in groups of thirty to forty while the orderlies cleaned the cells. Everyone was stark naked, night and day. Fortunately it was warm. As for me, I was allowed to keep my slippers.

An orderly had just given me a lit cigarette. Sitting there in the sun I reflected that I'd been inside five days now and yet I'd not been able to get into touch with Salvidia.

A lunatic came over to me. I knew about him: his name was Fouchet. His mother had sold her house to send him fifteen thousand francs through a warder so he could escape. The screw was supposed to keep five thousand and give him ten thousand. The screw swiped the lot and then left for Cayenne. When Fouchet heard his mother had sent him the money - heard it from another source - and that she had stripped herself all to no purpose, he went raving mad and that same day he attacked the warders. They got on top of him before he could do any damage. And from that day, three or four years back, he'd been in the asylum.

'Who are you?' I looked at this poor chap, a young fellow of about thirty, standing there questioning me. 'Who am I? Why, a man like you, mate; neither more nor less.' 'That's a stupid answer. I can see you're a man, since you've got a prick and balls: if you'd been a woman you'd have had a hole. I was asking who you were? I mean, what's your name?' 'Papillon.' 'Papillon? You're a butterfly? Poor fellow. Butterflies have wings - they fly. And where are yours?' 'I've lost them.' 'You must find them. That way you'd be able to escape. The screws have no wings. Give me your cigarette.' Before I had time to hold it out he'd snatched it from my fingers. Then he sat down opposite me and drew in the smoke with delight.

'And who are you?' I asked him.

'Me? I'm the one they call the fall-boy. Every time I ought to be given something that belongs to me I'm done right in the eye.' 'How come?' 'That's just the way it is. So that's why I kill as many screws as ever I can. I hanged a couple last night. But don't tell a soul.' 'What did you hang them for?' 'They stole my mother's house. My mother sent me her house, do you see? And as they liked the look of it they kept it and now they're living in it. I was right to hang them, wasn't I?' 'Quite right. Now they won't be able to profit by it.' 'Do you see that fat screw over there, behind the bars? He lives in the house too. Believe you me, I'll do him in.' And he stood up and walked off.

What a relief! It was no sort of picnic, being forced to live among all these lunatics; and it was dangerous. At night they roared and shrieked all round me, and when the moon was full they were more frantic than ever. How can the moon possibly affect the condition of mad people? I can't explain it; but often and often I've seen it happen.

The screws reported on the mental cases under observation. With me they made a whole lot of cross-checks. For example they'd purposely forget to let me out into the yard, to see whether I'd notice it and complain. Or else they'd leave out one of my meals. I had a stick with a piece of string and I went through the motions of fishing. 'Are they biting. Papillon?' asked the chief warder. 'Not likely. Because whenever I go fishing there's a little fish that follows me everywhere, and when it sees a big one just going to bite it says, "Watch out, don't bite - it's Papillon who's fishing." That's why I never catch any. But still, I go on. Maybe one day there'll be a fish that doesn't believe it."

I heard the screw say to an orderly, "Well, he's right round the bend."

When I ate at the big table in the dining-hall, I never could manage to get my dish of lentils down. There was a gigantic creature well over six feet tall, with arms, legs and trunk as hairy as an ape, who had picked on me as his victim. He always sat down next to me. The lentils were served very hot, so you had to wait for them to cool before you could eat them. I'd take my wooden spoon, and by blowing on them I'd manage to swallow a few. As for Ivanhoe (he thought he was Ivanhoe), he'd take his bowl, make a funnel of his hands and gulp the whole lot down in one go. Then he'd take mine without so much as by your leave and do the same. When he'd licked it clean he'd bang it down in front of me and stare at me with his huge bloodshot eyes as though to say, "There you see how I eat lentils?" I was beginning to have had quite enough of Ivanhoe, and as I was not yet certified, I made up my mind to use him as a pretext for something spectacular. It was lentil day again. Ivanhoe was right there. He sat down next to me. His mad face was beaming with delight - already felt the ecstasy of scoffing down his own lentils - mine too. I pulled a big, full, heavy earthenware water-jug towards me. The giant had scarcely raised my bowl and begun to pour my lentils down his throat before I stood up and broke the jug over his head with all my strength. He fell down with an animal cry. Instantly all the other lunatics upon one another, armed with their dishes. There was a palling uproar and throughout the whole scene every one of these characters kept roaring and howling.

I was back in my cell, carried like a lump by four orderlies, who moved fast and without tenderness. I went out like a maniac, saying Ivanhoe had stolen my wallet and identity-card. That did the trick. The doctor decided to certify me as irresponsible for my actions. All the screws agreed that I was a quiet looney, but with very dangerous mannerisms. Ivanhoe had a splendid bandage on his head: it served to give him a three-inch wound. Fortunately he did not bleed at the same time as me.

I was able to have a talk with Salvidia. He already had a copy of the key of the dispensary, where the barrels were kept. He was trying to get hold of enough wire to fasten them together. I told him I was afraid wire might break with the straining of the barrels in the sea and that it would be better to use rope, as having more give. He was going to try to get it, so we'd have both rope and wire. He also had three keys to make – one for my cell, one for the passage leading to it, and one for the main gate of the asylum. There were very few patrols. Only one warder for every four-hour guard duty – from nine to one in the morning and from one to five. There were two screws who always slept right through their guard and never made any rounds – they relied on a convict orderly who went on duty with them. So everything was in train, and now it was only a matter of waiting. I had another month at the most to endure.

As I walked into the yard the head warder gave me a cigar – a very poor cigar – already lit. But poor or not, it seemed marvellous to me. I looked at this herd of mother-naked men, singing, weeping, mopping and mowing, talking to themselves. They were still all wet from the shower each one had to take before being allowed into the yard, and their poor bodies showed the marks of the blows they had received or that they had given themselves, and the marks of the too tightly laced strait-jackets. This was indeed the end of the way down the drain. How many of these lunatics had been judged responsible for their actions by psychiatrists in France?

Titin – that was his nickname – belonged to my 1933 convoy. He had killed a man in Marseilles, then he had taken a taxi, loaded his victim into it and had himself driven to the hospital: there he said, 'Here, see to this man: I believe he's ill.' He was arrested on the spot, and the jury had the nerve to say he hadn't the very least degree of irresponsibility. And yet he must already have been crazy to have done a thing like that. Ordinarily speaking, the very dimmest of minds would have known he was going to be grabbed right away. Titin was here, sitting next to me. He had chronic dysentery – a walking corpse. He said, 'There are little monkeys in my guts, you know, Papillon. Some of them are wicked and they bite when they're angry – that's why I shit blood. The others are the furry sort, covered with hair, and their hands are as soft as down. They stroke me gently and they stop the wicked ones biting. When the good monkeys stand up for me, why then I don't shit blood.'

'Do you remember Marseilles, Titin?'

'I most certainly do. Indeed, I remember it very well. The Place de la Bourse with the ponces and the strong-arm gangs ...'

'Do you remember any of their names? L'Ange le Lucre Le Gravat? Clément?'

'No, I don't remember names: just a bastard of a cabb who took me to the hospital with my sick friend and the said it was because of me he was sick. That's all.'

'What about your friends?'

'Don't know.'

Poor Titin: I gave him the end of my cigar and got up. My heart was filled with an immense pity for this poor soul who would certainly die there like a dog. Yes, it was very dangerous living among all these lunatics, but what could I do about it? In any case, as far as I could see it was the only way of preparing a break without the risk of a death sentence.

Salvidia was almost ready. He had two of the keys and he only lacked the one for my cell. He had also got hold of a length of very good rope, and what's more he'd made another out of strips of hammock canvas – a five-way plait, he told me. Everything was going well as far as that was concerned.

I was in a hurry to get moving, for it was really tough, holding out in the asylum and keeping up this act. To have the right to stay in the part of the asylum where my cell was, I had to break out and be violent every now and then.

Once I had such a convincing fit that the medical warders put me into a very hot bath with two bromide injections. There was a very strong canvas cover over it, so I couldn't get out. All that could be seen was my head, poking up through a hole. I'd been in the bath, held down by this sort of strait-waistcoat, for a couple of hours when Ivanhoe walked in. I was terrified by the way the great brute looked at me. I had a horrible dread that he was going to strangle me. I couldn't defend myself in any way, because my arms were underneath the canvas.

He came up to me and his big eyes looked attentively into my face: he looked as though he were trying to make out where he'd seen this head before – this head that now emerged from the cloth as from a frame. He breathed all over me, and his breath stank of decay. I felt like shouting for help, but I was afraid that calling out might make him madder. I closed my eyes and waited, sure that he was just about to strangle me with his enormous lumpish hands. I shan't forget those moments of terror in a hurry. At last he moved off, walked about the room and then went up to the little wheels that controlled the water. He turned off the cold and turned the hot, the boiling hot, full on. I howled and shrieked like a lost soul, for I was being literally boiled. Ivanhoe disappeared. The whole room was full of steam: I choked as I breathed and I made superhuman efforts to tear off the wretched canvas, but in vain. At last help arrived. The screws had seen the steam coming out of the windows. When they took me out of my cauldron I was horribly burnt and I was in the most hellish pain. It was particularly my thighs and my private parts, which had lost all their skin. They dressed my burns with picric acid and put me into the asylum's little infirmary. The burns were so bad they called the doctor. A few injections of morphia helped me through the first twenty-four hours. When the medico asked me what had happened, I told him a volcano had erupted in the bath. No one could make it out. The medical warder accused the character who'd run the bath of having misused the taps.

Salvidia came and treated my burns with picric acid ointment. He was ready, and he pointed out that it was lucky I was in the infirmary, because if the break were to fail we could get back into this part of the asylum without being seen. He was going to make a copy of the infirmary key right away - he'd already taken a print on a piece of soap and he would have the finished job tomorrow. It was up to me to let him know the day I felt well enough to take advantage of the sleeping screws being on guard.

It was for tonight, during the watch that lasted from one o'clock till five in the morning. Salvidia wasn't on duty. To gain time, he was going to empty the vinegar barrel about eleven o'clock. We'd roll the oil barrel down full, because the sea was very rough and perhaps the oil would help us calm it for the launch.

I had flour sack trousers cut off at the knee, a woollen sweater and a good knife in my belt. I also had a waterproof bag that I was going to hang round my neck - it held cigar kneysack full of manioc flour that he had soaked in oil and sugar. About seven pounds, he told me. It was late. I sat there on my bed waiting for my friend. My heart was thumping hard. In a few minutes the break was going to begin. May good luck and almighty God be on my side, so that I may escape from the road down the drain and leave it for good and all!

It was strange, but my thoughts only touched on the past but faintly, glancing towards my father and my family. Not a single picture of the arrizes, the jury or the prosecuting counsel. But just as the door opened, in spite of myself I once more had a vision of Matthieu standing there, carried along the surface of the sea by the sharks.

'Papi, let's go!' I followed him. Quickly he closed the door and hid the key in a corner of the passage. 'Quick, quick.' We reached the dispensary: the door was open. Getting the empty barrel out was child's play. He slung the ropes over his shoulder and I took the wire and the knapsack with flour in it. In the pitch dark night I started rolling my barrel down towards the sea. He came behind, with the oil barrel. Fortunately he was very strong and it was quite easy for him to keep it from plunging down the steep descent.

'Slowly, slowly, take care it doesn't run away with you.' I waited for him, in case he should lose his hold on the barrel - if he did, I could block its run with mine. I went down backwards, me in front and my barrel behind. We reached the bottom of the path without any sort of difficulty. There was a little path in the direction of the sea, but after that it was very hard going over the rocks.

'Empty the barrel: we'll never get across with it full.' There was a stiff wind blowing and the waves were crashing furiously against the rocks. Fine, the barrel was empty. 'Ram the bung in hard. Wait a minute: put this bit of tin over it.' The holes were already made. 'Drive the nails right home.' The hammering would never be heard over the roaring of the wind and sea.

We lashed the two barrels tight together, but carrying them over the rocks was very difficult. Each of them was made to hold fifty gallons: they took up a lot of space and they were very awkward to handle. The place my friend had chosen for the launching made things no easier, either. 'Shove, for God's sake! Up a bit. Look out for the wave!' Both of us and two barrels were picked up and flung hard back on to the rock. 'Take care. They'll smash, to say nothing of us breaking an arm or a leg!'

'Take it easy, Salvidia. Either go in front, towards the sea, or stand here behind. That's right. Heave the moment I give a shout. I'll shove at the same second and then we'll certainly get free of the rocks. But to do it, we've just got to hold tight and stay where we are, even if the sea breaks right over us.'

I shouted these orders to my friend in the midst of the thunder of the wind and the waves, and I think he heard them: a big wave swept completely over us as we clung to the barrels. At this moment I shoved madly on the raft with all my strength. And he must certainly have done the same, because all at once there we were afloat, away from the rocks. He was up on the barrels before me, but just as I hauled myself on, a huge breaker heaved up beneath us and tossed us like a feather on to a pointed rock farther out at sea. The impact was so shattering that the barrels smashed open, scattering in fragments. When the wave drew back it swept me more than twenty yards from the rock. I swam and let myself be carried in by the next wave that ran straight for the shore. I landed in a sitting position between two rocks. I just had time to cling on before being swept away. Bruised all over, I managed to scramble out; but when I reached dry land, I realized that I'd been carried more than a hundred yards from the place where we'd launched the raft.

Taking no sort of care I shouted, 'Salvidia! Romeo! Where are you?' There was no answer. Quite overwhelmed I lay down on the path: I took off my sweater and my trousers, and there I was again, naked, wearing just my slippers. Christ, where was my friend? And once again I shouted with all my strength, 'Where are you?' Only the wind, the sea and the waves replied. I stayed there I don't know how long, numbed, completely shattered, mentally and physically. Then, weeping with fury, I threw away the little bag I had round my neck for my tobacco and lighter - a mark of my friend's real affection, for he himself was no smoker.

Standing there facing the wind and the huge waves that had swept everything away. I raised my clenched fist and insulted God. 'You swine. You filthy bugger, aren't You ashamed of persecuting me like this? You're supposed to be a good God, aren't You? You're a disgusting brute, that's all. A sadist, a bloody sadist! A perverted sod! I'll never utter Your name again. You don't deserve it.'

The wind had dropped, and the seeming calm did me good – brought me back to a sense of reality. I'd go back to the asylum, and if I could I'd get back into the infirmary. With a little luck, it should be possible.

I climbed the hill with just one idea in my head – getting back and lying down in my bed. Neither seen nor heard. I got into the infirmary passage with no difficulty. I'd had to climb the asylum wall, because I didn't know where Salvidia had put the key of the main gate.

I didn't have to look long before I found the infirmary key. I went in and double-locked the door behind me. I went to the window and threw the key far out – it fell the other side of the wall. And I went to bed. The only thing that could give me away was the fact that my slippers were soaked. I got up and wrung them out in the lavatory. Gradually, with the sheet over my face, I began to get warm again. The wind and the salt water had chilled me through and through. Had my friend really been drowned? Perhaps he had been swept much farther out than me and had been able to get ashore at the far end of the island. Hadn't I gone away from the rocks too soon? I ought to have waited a little longer. I blamed myself for having given in too quickly – for having given up my friend for lost.

In the drawer of the bedside table there were two sleeping pills. I swallowed them without water. My saliva was enough to get them down.

I was still asleep when the warder shook me awake. The room was full of light and the window was open. Three patients were looking in from outside. 'What's the matter, Papillon? You're sleeping like one of the dead. Haven't you drunk your coffee? It's cold. Here, drink it up.'

I was scarcely awake, but even so I grasped that as far as I was concerned everything was normal. 'What have you woken me up for?'

'Because now your burns are better your bed is wanted. You're going back to your cell.'

'OK, Chief.' And I followed him. On the way he left me in the yard. I took advantage of this to dry my slippers in the sun.

It was three days now since the failure of the break. I had heard not the least reference to it. I went to and fro from my cell to the yard and then from the yard back to my cell. Salvadia did not turn up again: so the poor fellow was dead, no doubt smashed against the rocks. I myself had had a narrow escape, and the reason I came out alive was certainly because I was behind rather than in front. But who could tell? I'd have to get out of the asylum. It was going to be harder to get them to believe I was cured, or at least fit to go back to the camp, than it had been to get inside in the first place. I'd now have to persuade the doctor that I was better.

'Monsieur Rouvriot (he was the chief attendant), I'm cold at night. If I promise not to dirty my clothes, would you please let me have trousers and a shirt?' The screw was amazed. He stared at me with wide open eyes for a while, and then he said, 'Sit down here by me, Papillon. Tell me what's going on.'

'I'm surprised to find myself here, Chief. It's the asylum, isn't it? And so I'm in with the loonies. Did I somehow come adrift from my senses? Why am I here? It would be kind of you to tell me, Chief.'

'Poor old Papillon, you've been ill: but now it looks to me as though you're getting better. Would you like to work?'

'Yes.'

'What would you like to do?'

'Anything.'

So I was given clothes and I helped clean out the cells. In the evening my door was left open until nine, and it was only when the night screw came on duty that they shut me in.

The other day a man from the Auvergne, a convict orderly, spoke to me for the first time. We were alone in the guard-room. The screw hadn't come yet. I didn't know this guy, but he said he knew me quite well. 'It's not worth going on with the act, mate,' he said.

'What do you mean?'

'What do I mean? You don't imagine it took me in, do you? I've been looking after lunatics for seven years and from the very first week I saw that you were swinging the lead.'

'So what?'

'I'll tell you what. I'm really sorry you didn't bring off your break with Salvadia. It cost him his life. I honestly regret him, because he was a good friend of mine, although he didn't let me in on it. But I don't hold that against him. If you need anything at all, just let me know - I'll be happy.'

ere was such an open look in his eye that I was sure he straight. And although I'd never heard anybody say any of him, I'd never heard any bad either: so he was certainly a good guy.

oor Salvidia! There must have been a hell of a turmoil when they discovered he was gone. Pieces of barrel were and along the shore. They were certain he'd been eaten by the sharks. The medico shrieked and howled about the wasted olive oil. He said that with the war on they weren't ever likely to see another drop.

'What do you advise me to do?'
'I'll put you on the fatigue that goes out of the asylum every day and fetches the stores from the hospital. That'll make a walk for you. Start behaving properly. Out of ten things you say, let eight of them be sensible. Because you mustn't get better too quickly, either.'

'Thanks. What's your name?'
'Dupont.'

'Thanks. I shan't forget your advice.'
It was nearly a month now since I'd mucked up that break. Six days after it they had found my friend's body floating. By some extraordinary chance the sharks had not eaten him. But it seems that other fishes had had all his entrails and part of one leg, or so Dupont told me. His skull had been bashed in. He was so far gone there was no post-mortem. I asked Dupont whether he could get a letter out by the post for me. It would have to be given to Galgani for him to slip it in just as the mail sack was being sealed. I wrote to Romeo Salvidia's mother in Italy.

'Madame, your son died without chains on his legs. He died bravely at sea, far from warders and from prison. He died free, struggling courageously to gain his liberty. We each promised the other to write to his family in case any thing happened to either of us. I am doing this painful duty and I kiss your hands as a son would do.'

Papillon, your boy's friend.'

Once this duty was done, I determined never to think that nightmare any more. That was what life was like. Well I had to do now was to get out of the asylum, have myself sent to Devil's Island whatever the cost, and try another break.

The screw gave me the job of looking after his garden. I'd been well for two months now and my work was so much appreciated that the bloody fool of a warder wouldn't let me go. The Auvergnat told me that after the last examination the doctor had wanted to let me out of the asylum and put me into the camp for a probationary period. The screw was dead against the idea, saying his garden had never been so carefully looked after.

So this morning I pulled up all the strawberry plants and tossed them on to the rubbish-heap. Where each had been, I stuck a little cross: one cross for each plant. Uproar and hullabaloo! The great lump of a screw very nearly burst with indignation. He frothed, and it choked him as he tried to speak – the sounds wouldn't come out properly. In the end he sat down on the wheel-barrow and shed real tears. I had exaggerated a little: but then what else could I do?

The doctor didn't take such a serious view. 'This patient must be sent to the camp for a probationary period, so as to readapt himself to ordinary life,' he insisted. 'It was because he was all alone in the garden that this crazy notion came into his head. Tell me, Papillon, why did you pull up the strawberries and put crosses in their places?'

'I can't explain, Doctor, and I beg the warder's pardon. He was so fond of those strawberries that I'm really very much upset. I'll ask God to send him some more.'

Here I was back in the camp with my friends again. Carbonieri's place was empty: I slung my hammock next to the empty space, just as though Matthieu were still there.

The doctor made me sew a label on my blouse saying 'under special treatment'. Nobody but the doctor was allowed to give me orders. He told me I was to sweep up the leaves in front of the hospital from eight until ten in the morning. I had coffee and cigarettes sitting with the doctor in front of his house. His wife was there too, and she helped him to get me to talk about my past. 'And what happened then, Papillon? What was it like after you left the pearl-diving Indians?' I spent the whole afternoon with those wonderful people. 'Come and see me every day, Papillon,' said the doctor's wife. 'In the first place I want to see you and then I also want to hear about your experiences.'

Every day I spent some hours with the doctor and his wife, and sometimes with his wife alone. They thought that if the made me talk about my past life, it would help to steady my mind for good and all. I decided to ask the doc to have me sent to Devil's Island.

It was done: I was to leave the next day. The doctor and his wife knew why I was going to Devil's Island. They'd been so good to me I hadn't wanted to deceive them. 'Doc, I just can't stand penal any longer: have me sent to Devil's Island so I can either make a break or perish in the attempt. It's got to end somehow.'

'I know what you mean, Papillon. This system of repression makes me feel sick, and the service is rotten through and through. So good-bye and good luck!'

Dreyfus's Seat

This was the smallest of the three Iles du Salut. The most northerly, too, and the most directly in the path of the wind and the waves. First there was a narrow strip that ran right round the island at sea level, and then the ground rose steeply to a little plain with the warders' guard-house and a single block for the convicts – about ten of them. Convicts sentenced for common-law offences were not officially supposed to be sent to Devil's Island; it was reserved for political offenders, each of whom lived in his own little house with a corrugated-iron roof. On Mondays they were given their rations for the week, uncooked, and every day a loaf of bread. There were perhaps thirty of them. The medical attendant was Dr. Léger, who had poisoned his whole family in Lyons or thereabouts. The political prisoners would have nothing to do with the convicts and sometimes they would write to Cayenne, complaining about some transportee or other. When that happened he'd be taken away and sent back to Royale.

There was a cable, a wire rope, between Royale and Devil's Island, because quite often the sea was too rough for the boat from Royale to come over to the little concrete landing-stage.

The chief warder of the camp (there were three warders) was called Santori. He was a filthy great brute and he often had a week's beard on his face. 'Papillon, I hope you'll behave well on Devil's Island. If you don't get in my hair then I'll leave you in peace. Go on up to the camp. I'll see you again there.'

In the hall I found six convicts – two Chinese, two Negroes, a guy from Bordeaux and another from Lille. One of the Chinese knew me well; he'd been in Saint-Laurent with me, under investigation for a killing. He was an Indo-Chinese, one of the survivors of the mutiny at Pulo-Condor, a penal settlement in those parts. He was a pirate by trade, and he used to attack sampans, sometimes killing the whole crew and their could afford to neglect my fishing. I had enough for the doc, for Santori, and for the Chinese and myself.

This was 1941 and I'd been in prison eleven years. I was thirty-five. I'd spent the best years of my life either in a cell or in a black-hole. I'd only had seven months of total freedom with my Indian tribe. The children my Indian wives must have had by me would be eight years old now. How terrible! How quickly the time had flashed by! But a backward glance showed all these hours and minutes studding my calvary as terribly long, and each one of them hard to bear.

Thirty-five! Where was Montmartre, the Place Blanche, Pigalle, the Petit Jardin dance-hall, the Boulevard de Clichy? Where was Nénette, with her Madonna's face – a perfect cameo? Nénette at the assizes, her great despairing black eyes fixed on me, shouting, 'Don't worry, sweetheart. I'll come out there and find you!' Where was Raymond Hubert and his 'We shall be acquitted'? Where were the twelve bastards of the jury? And the cops? And the prosecuting counsel? What were my father and my sisters' families doing under the German yoke?

All those breaks! Let's see. Just how many of them were there?

The first, when I got away from the hospital, having knocked out the screws.

The second from Rio Hacha, in Colombia. That was the finest. That time I succeeded completely. Why did I ever leave my tribe? A thrill passed through me: it was as though I could still feel myself making love with those two Indian sisters.

Then the third, fourth, fifth and sixth at Baranquilla. What bad luck I had in all those breaks! The rising in the chapel, which failed so dismally. The dynamite that wasn't strong enough: and then Clousiot hooking up his trousers. And the sleeping-draught working so slowly.

The seventh on Royale, where that sod Bébert Celier informed on me. Without him that one would have succeeded for sure. If he'd kept his mouth shut, I'd now be free with my poor friend Carbonieri.

The eighth, the last, from the asylum. A mistake, a very bad mistake on my part. Letting the Italian choose the place for launching. Two hundred yards farther down towards the slaughter-house it would certainly have been easier to get the raft out to sea.

This bench, where the innocent and yet condemned Dreyfus had found the strength to go on living in spite of everything, must be an example to me. It must teach me not to give in. To try another break. Yes, this smooth, polished stone, high over the rocky chasm where the incessant waves came thundering in, must give me strength. Dreyfus never let himself be discouraged, and he fought for his rehabilitation right through to the very end. It's true he had Zola and his famous J'accuse to help him. Still, if he hadn't been a man of real courage so much injustice would certainly have made him throw himself over the precipice from this same bench. He stuck it out. I couldn't do less; and I must give up the idea of a fresh death-or-glory break. It was the word death I was to give up; I must think of nothing but how I was going to win and be free.

During the long hours I spent sitting on Dreyfus's seat my mind wandered, dreaming of the past and building up a rosy future. I was often dazzled by the powerful light and by the silvery gleam of the waves. I gazed at this sea so long without really seeing it that I came to know every possible turn and eddy of the wind-driven waves. The tireless, inexorable sea threw itself upon the outermost rocks of the island. It searched and stripped them, as though it were saying to Devil's Island, 'Get out. You've got to go. You're in my way as I run in towards the mainland - you bar my path. That's why I'm breaking off little bits of you every single day, never letting up.' When there was a storm the sea really let itself go, and not only did it rush in and sweep away everything it could destroy as it withdrew, but it also thrust water into every nook and cranny so as gradually to undermine those enormous rocks that seemed to say, 'No one gets past me.'

It was then that I made an important discovery. Immediately below Dreyfus's seat the waves came in, broke against some huge hump-backed rocks and rushed furiously back. The tons of water they brought in could not spread, because they were hemmed in by two rocks forming a horseshoe fifteen to twenty feet across. Beyond that rose the cliff, so the water could only get out by going back into the sea.

This was very important, for if I were to throw myself into the sea with a sack of coconuts, plunging into the wave that moment it broke and flooded the horseshoe, it would, without a shadow of doubt, take me with it as it withdrew.

I knew where I could get several jute sacks, because you could have as many as you liked at the pig-house when you wanted to gather coconuts.

The first thing was to have a trial run. The tides were highest and the waves were strongest at the full moon. I should wait till then. I hid a well-sewn sack, filled with coconuts, in a kind of grotto you could only get into by diving. I had come across it one day when I was diving for langoustines. They clung to the ceiling of the cave – air got into it only at low tide. In another sack that I tied to the one with the coconuts, I put a rock weighing five or six stone. As I meant to go off with two sacks instead of one and as I weighed eleven stone, everything was in proportion.

I was very excited by this experiment. This side of the island was completely safe – no one would ever imagine a man would choose the most exposed and therefore the most dangerous place for getting away. Yet it was the only place from which – always providing I could get away from the shore – I would be swept out to the open sea, so that it would be impossible for me to be driven on to Royale. It was from that point therefore and no other that I must set off.

The sack with the nuts and the other with the rock were too heavy to carry easily. I could not manage to haul them over the slippery rocks, always wet from the breaking waves. I'd spoken to Chang and he was going to help me. He brought along a whole mass of fishing things – deep-sea tackle and so on – so that if anyone came upon us suddenly we could say we were laying out lines to catch sharks.

'Shove, Chang. A little more and it's there.' The full moon lit up the scene as though it were daylight. I was deafened by the roar of the breaking waves. 'Are you ready, Papillon?' asked Chang. 'Throw it into this one.' A curling fifteen-foot wave hurled itself furiously against the rock: it broke beneath us, but the impact was so violent that its crest passed over the rock, soaking us from head to foot. That didn't prevent us from flinging the sack in the very moment the water stood at its highest before the back-draught. The sack, swept away like a straw, was carried out to sea.

'We've done it, Chang! How terrific!'

'Wait: see if him come back.'

To my horror, scarcely five minutes later, I saw my sack driving in on the top of a huge roller, twenty-five or thirty feet high - a roller that carried the coconut sack and the stone as though they weighed nothing at all, bearing it along a little in front of the foam on the crest and flinging it with unbelievable force against the rock a little to the left of the place it had started from. The sack burst, the coconuts scattered, and the stone rolled down to the bottom of the chasm.

Soaked through and through (for the waves had broken over us and very nearly swept us off our feet - though fortunately in the landward direction), scraped and battered, Chang and I scrambled away from the accursed spot without a backward glance.

'Not good, Papillon. Not good, this idea of break from Devil. Royale, him better. From south side Royale you go better than from here.'

'Yes, but on Royale the escape would be discovered within two hours. As there's nothing but the push of the water to get the sack along, the three boats on the island could hunt me in. Whereas here to begin with there's no boats: and that I'm sure of having the whole night in front of me before they find out I've made a break: and lastly they may very well think I've been drowned fishing. There's no telephone on Devil's Island. If I set off in a heavy sea there's no boat that can land here. So it's from Devil's Island that I must go. Do you how?'

The sun blazed down at noon. A tropical sun that made your brains feel they were boiling inside your skull. A sun that shrivelled every plant that hadn't had time to grow big enough to stand it. A sun that dried out the shallow pools of sea-water in a few hours, leaving a white film of salt behind that made the air dance and tremble. Yet the air barely stirred about in front of my eyes, and the reflection from the sea dazzled me. Yet there I was on Dragon's war boat, and none of these things could prevent me from entering the sea. And it was then that I suddenly realised what a stupid fool I had been all this time. The great roller came as big as the other waves that had tossed my sack back against the rocks, shattering it - this roller only came once in every five waves.

vast mass struck the two rocks harder and straighter than ever; and when the wave broke in the space between them, the crash was even more deafening than before.

'And that's the place where you say we have to chuck ourselves in? Well, what a sweet choice you've made to be sure. I wouldn't touch it with a barge-pole. I'm quite willing to go off on a break, yes: but plain suicide, no thank you very much!' Sylvain was much impressed by the way I'd just described Lisette. He'd been on Devil's Island these last three days, and of course I'd suggested that we should go off together. Each on a raft. In that way, if he agreed, I should have a companion on the mainland to make another break with. All alone in the bush was no sort of fun.

'Don't let it get you down before you've thought it over. Certainly the first idea of it would startle anyone; but it's the only wave that can sweep you out so far that the others won't drive you on to the rocks again.'

'No worry,' said Chang. 'We've tried. Once you off, you never come back to Devil for sure, nor touch on Royale.'

It took me a week to persuade Sylvain. He was solid bone and muscle, five foot eleven, with a very well-proportioned athletic body.

'All right. I agree we'll be swept out far enough. But after that, how long do you think it would take for the tides to carry us to the mainland?'

'To be honest, Sylvain, I don't know. It might be longer or shorter: it would all depend on the weather. The wind wouldn't have much hold on us, because we'd be too low down in the water. But if the weather's bad, the waves will be higher and they'll drive us in towards the forest all the faster. In seven, eight, or ten tides at the most, we ought to be thrown up on the shore. So, counting slack water and all, it should be something like forty-eight or sixty hours.'

'How do you work that out?'

'From the islands to the coast in a straight line, it's not more than twenty-five miles. Drifting, you'd be following the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle. Look at the direction of the waves. Roughly speaking, you'd have to travel between seventy-five or at the outside a hundred miles. The nearer we get to the coast, the more the waves carry us straight in. And then, isn't it obvious that at this distance from the shore a piece of driftwood must travel at least three miles an hour?'

He looked and listened very attentively: he was a bright boy, all right. 'No, I admit you're not talking balls, and if it weren't for the low tides losing us time by taking us out to sea, we'd certainly be on the coast in under thirty hours. But counting the ebbs, I think you're about right - we'll be there in forty-eight to sixty hours.'

'You're convinced, then? You'll come with me?'

'Almost convinced. Suppose we were in the bush on the mainland. What should we do then?'

'We'd have to get to the outskirts of Kourou. There's a fair-sized fishing village there and men who go out after wild rubber and gold. We'd have to take care when we get close, because there's also a convicts' logging-camp. There'll certainly be forest tracks leading to Cayenne or the Chinese camp called Inini. We'll have to hold up a convict or a black civilian and make him take us to Inini. If the character behaves well, we'll give him five hundred francs and then he can bugger off. If it's a convict, we'll make him join our break.'

'What do we want to go to Inini for? It's a special camp for Indo-Chinese.'

'Chang's brother is there.'

'Yes, my brother him there. Him go off on break with you: him find boat and food for sure. You meet Cuic-Cuic and you have everything for break. Chinese man never inform. So you find any Annamite in bush, you speak him, him tell Cuic-Cuic.'

'Why do they call your brother Cuic-Cuic?' asked Sylvain.

'Don't know. It was Frenchman call him Cuic-Cuic.' He went on, 'Take care. When you nearly reach mainland, you find mud. Never you walk on him: mud bad, mud suck you. Wait for next tide. float you into bush - catch creeper, tree-branch, pull. Otherwise you fucked.'

'That's right, Sylvain. Never walk on the mud even if you're very, very close in. You have to wait until you can grab hold of branches or creepers.'

'OK, Papillon, I've made up my mind to come.'

'We'll make the two rafts almost exactly the same, since we are both about the same weight - that will prevent us from drifting far apart. But there's no telling. In case we lose touch, how shall we find one another again? You can't see Kourou from here, but when you were on Roy's boat you notice some white rocks about ten miles to the right of Kourou? You can see them clearly when the sun strikes them.'

'Yes.'

'Those are the only rocks anywhere along the coast. Stretching out for ever, right and left, it's just mud. The white on the rocks is birds' shit. There are thousands of them, and since nobody ever goes there, that will be a perfect place for us to recover before plunging into the bush. We'll eat eggs and the coconuts that we'll take with us. No fire. The first to get there will wait for the other.'

'How many days?'

'Five. It's impossible that the other shouldn't be at the meeting-place in five days.'

The two rafts were ready. We'd lined the sacks so they should be stronger. I asked Sylvain to wait ten days so that I could spend as many hours as possible, training myself to ride a sack. He did the same. I noticed that every time the sacks were just going to turn over it needed an extra effort to keep upright. Whenever we could, we'd have to lie down on them. And take care not to go to sleep, because falling into the sea might mean losing your sack and never being able to reach it again. Chang made me a little water-proof bag to hang round my neck with cigarettes and a tinder lighter. We were going to grate ten coconuts each and carry them with us - the meat would help us bear the hunger and it would quench our thirst. It seemed that Santori had a kind of leather wine-skin he never used, so Chang, who went to the screw's house from time to time, was going to try and knock it off.

The break was for ten o'clock on Sunday evening. With the full moon the tide would rise twenty-five feet. So Lisette would be coming in with all her strength. Chang was going to feed the pigs all by himself on Sunday morning. I was going to sleep all Saturday and all Sunday. We'd set off at ten, when the ebb would already have been running for two hours.

It was impossible for my two sacks to come apart: they were bound together by plaited hemp ropes and brass wire and sewn together with strong sail-thread. We had found bigger sacks than usual, and their mouths overlapped so the coconuts couldn't get out either.

Sylvain did exercises all the time and I let the little waves come breaking against my legs for hours on end. The continual beating of the water against my thighs and the way I had to tense myself to withstand each wave made my legs and thighs as strong as steel.

There was a ten-foot chain in a disused well on the island. I wove it in and out of the ropes holding my sacks. I had a bolt that I passed through the links: in case I couldn't hold out any more, I would chain myself to the sacks. And perhaps like that I might be able to sleep without the risk of falling into the water and losing my raft. If the sacks turned over, the water would wake me up and I would right them.

'Only three days to go, Papillon.' We were sitting on Dreyfus's bench, watching Lisette.

'Yes, only three days, Sylvain. I believe we're going to bring it off. What do you think, brother?'

'It's certain, Papillon. Tuesday night or Wednesday morning we'll be in the bush. And then hey-diddle-diddle, the cat and the fiddle for us.'

Chang was going to grate us ten coconuts apiece. And as well as knives, we'd take two machetes stolen from the tool store.

The camp lay to the east of Kourou. It was only by walking towards the sun in the morning that we could be sure of being in the right direction.

'Monday morning, Santori he'll be mad,' said Chang. 'Me no say you and Papillon vanish until three in the afternoon, when screw done siesta.'

'Why don't you rush in, saying a wave swept us away while we were fishing?'

'No. Me no want complication. Me say, "Chief, Papillon and Sylvain no come work today. Me feed pigs all alone." No more, no less.'

Break from Devil's Island

Sunday: seven o'clock in the evening. I'd just woken up. I'd been making myself sleep ever since Saturday morning. The moon didn't rise until nine. So outside the night was very dark.

A few stars in the sky. Big rain-bearing clouds raced by over our heads. We'd just left the prison block. Though it was against the rules we often went fishing by night or just walked about the island, so the others thought this perfectly natural.

A boy went back in with his lover, a big fat Arab. They'd certainly been making love in some hiding-place or other. As I watched them lifting the plank to get into the block I reflected that the Arab, with his boy-friend at hand to stuff two or three times a day, must have reached his highest point of happiness. For him the possibility of fulfilling his erotic desires must change prison into paradise. It was no doubt much the same for the fairy. He might have been something between twenty-three and twenty-five. His body was no longer as youthful as all that – no langourous adolescent. He kept in the shade all the time to preserve his milk-white skin, but for all that he was beginning to lose the Adonis touch. Yet here in penal he had more lovers than he could ever have dreamt of having in the free world. Apart from his fancy-man, the Arab, he had customers at twenty-five francs a go, just like any tart on the Boulevard Rochechouart in Montmartre. He not only derived a good deal of pleasure from them, but he also made such a good thing of it that he and his 'husband' lived quite well. He and the men who frequented him wallowed in their vice and loved it; and ever since they had reached penal there had only been one idea in their heads – sex.

The prosecuting counsel, hoping to punish them by sending them down the drain, had mucked it up: for them, the drain was happiness itself. The plank closed behind the little pouffe, and Chang, Sylvain and I were alone. 'Let's go.' Quickly we made our way to the north end of the island.

We took the two rafts out of the cave. And straight away all three of us were soaked to the skin. The wind was blowing with the particular howl of a strong gale coming right in from the offing. Sylvain and Chang helped me shove my raft to the top of the rock. At the last moment I decided to chain my left wrist to the rope binding the sacks. All at once I was afraid of losing my hold and being swept away without them. Sylvain got up on to the opposite rock, helped by Chang. The moon was high now and we could see very well.

I had rolled a towel round my head. There were six waves to be waited for. Only a few minutes left now. Chang had come back to my side. He hugged me round the neck and then kissed me. He was going to lie there wedged in an angle of the rock and grip my legs to help me withstand the shock of Lisette's breaking.

'Only one more!' shouted Sylvain. 'Then we're away.' He was standing in front of his raft so as to protect it from the mass of water that was about to sweep over it. I was in the same position and in addition I had Chang's hands to hold me firm -- in his excitement he had driven his nails into the flesh of my calf.

Lisette came for us, driving in as tall as a steeple. She broke on our two rocks with her usual enormous crash and rushed up the side of the cliff.

I flung myself in a fraction of a second before my friend: he was in immediately after, and it was with the two rafts tight against one another that Lisette swept us racing out to sea. In less than five minutes we were more than three hundred yards from the shore. Sylvain had not yet climbed up on to his raft. I'd got on to mine within two minutes. Chang had hurried up to Dreyfus's seat, and he was waving a scrap of white cloth -- his last farewell. Now it was a good five minutes that we had been beyond the dangerous zone where the waves formed to drive right in for Devil's Island. Those that we were now riding were much longer; they had almost no foam, and they were so regular that we drifted along as though we were part of them; we were not tossed about and the rafts did not attempt to capsize. We rose and fell upon these great rollers, slowly moving out into the offing, for this was the ebb.

Once again, as I reached the top and turned my head right round, I caught a last glimpse of Chang's white handkerchief. Sylvain was not far from me -- perhaps fifty yards farther out to sea. Several times he held up his arm and waved it by way of showing triumph and delight.

That night was fairly easy going, and we very clearly felt the change in the sea's direction. The tide we left on had carried us out, but this one was now sweeping us in towards the mainland.

The sun rose on the horizon: so it was six o'clock. We were too low in the water to be able to see the coast. But I could tell we were very far away from the islands, because although the sun lit up their tops, we could scarcely make them out, let alone see that there were three of them. All I could see was a single mass. Since they could not be told apart, I judged they were at least fifteen miles away.

The feeling of triumph and success made me laugh. What if I were to try sitting up on my raft? The wind would then push me along, blowing on my back.

There, I was up. I undid the chain and took a turn round my belt. The bolt was well greased and it was easy to tighten the nut. I held my hands up for the wind to dry them. I was going to smoke a cigarette. There. I drew on it, inhaling deeply and letting the smoke out slowly. I was not frightened any more. There's no point in telling you about the stomach aches I had before, during the plunge and then just after. No, I wasn't afraid any more: so calm indeed that when I'd finished the cigarette I decided to eat a few mouthfuls of coconut meat. I got a pretty good handful down and then I lit another cigarette. Sylvain was a fair distance away. We caught fleeting glimpses of one another from time to time, when we both happened to be on top of a wave. The sun was blazing like hell on the top of my skull and my brains were coming to the boil. I wetted my towel and wrapped it round my head. I took off my woollen sweater - it was stifling me, in spite of the wind.

Christ! My raft had turned over and I'd very nearly drowned. Two big gulps of sea-water had gone down. In spite of all my efforts I could not manage to turn my sacks over again and get back on to them. The trouble was the chain - it did not leave me free enough in my movements. At last, having slipped the whole length over to the same side, I succeeded in treading water by the sacks and getting my breath back. I began trying to take the chain off altogether and I strained away at the nut. I got angrier and angrier, and perhaps because I was too nervous my fingers had not the strength to undo it.

God, what a relief! It had turned at last. A rough five minutes! It had almost sent me crazy, thinking I could never get free of that chain.

I didn't bother to turn the raft right side up; I was exhausted and I didn't feel I had the strength. I just worked myself up on to it the way it was. What did it matter that I was on its bottom? I'd never fasten myself on again, either with the chain or anything else. I'd already seen what a bloody-fool thing it was to do, chaining my wrist at the beginning. That ought to have been enough.

The pitiless sun burned my arms and legs. My face was on fire. It seemed to me that wetting it made it worse, because as soon as the water dried the burning was even fiercer.

The wind had almost entirely dropped, and although with the smaller waves it was more comfortable, I was not getting along so fast. A great deal of wind and a rough sea would really have been better.

I had such a violent cramp in my right leg that I called out, as though someone could hear me. I made the sign of the cross over the place, remembering that my grandmother had told me that would cure it. This homely remedy was a dismal failure. The sun was well down in the west. It was about four o'clock in the afternoon and this was the fourth tide since we had set out. It was a flood tide, and it seemed to me to be moving me in towards the coast with greater strength than the last.

Now I could see Sylvain all the time, and for his part he could see me very well, too. He hardly disappeared at all, because the waves were no height now. He'd taken off his shirt, and he was bare from the waist up. He waved: he was more than three hundred yards ahead of me, but farther out to sea. Judging from the white water round his raft, he was trying to row with his hands. It looked as though he were checking his raft's progress so that I could catch up. I lay down on my sacks, and thrusting my arms into the water I rowed too. If he braked and I hurried, perhaps we could lessen the distance between us. I'd chosen my companion in this escape very well. He could take it, one hundred per cent. I stopped rowing. I was tiring, and I must keep all my strength. I was going to try to turn the raft over, because the bag of food was underneath, together with the leather bottle of fresh water. I was hungry and thirsty. My lips were already cracked and burning. The best way of turning the sacks over was to cling to them on the side opposite the rising wave and then to kick just as they rose. After five attempts I was lucky enough to swing them over in one go. The effort exhausted me and I found it really hard to crawl up on to them again.

The sun was touching the horizon and presently it would disappear. So it was six o'clock, or nearly. Let's hope the night wouldn't be too rough, because as I saw it, it was the long soaking that was taking away my strength.

I had a good drink from Santori's leather bottle, but first I ate two handfuls of coconut meat. Quite happy, and with my hands dried in the wind, I got out a cigarette and smoked it - terrific. Before the darkness fell Sylvain waved his towel, and so did I: this was our way of saying good night. He was still the same distance from me. I sat with my legs stretched out: I dried my sweater as much as I could and put it on. Even wet, these sweaters kept you warm; and the moment the sun dipped I felt the cold.

The wind grew stronger. It was only the western clouds that were touched with pink low on the horizon. Now everything else was covered with a half-darkness that deepened every moment. The wind was blowing from the east, and over there I saw no clouds at all. So no danger of rain for the present.

Apart from holding on and not getting wetter than I had to, the only thing I thought about was whether it would be sensible to fasten myself to the sacks in case tiredness overcame me, or whether, seeing what I'd been through, it would be too dangerous. Then I discovered that the reason I'd been so hampered was that the chain was too short, one end being unnecessarily twisted in among the sacks' ropes and wires. It was easy to get at it. With that extra length I should be able to move about much more freely. I fixed the chain properly and attached it to my belt once more. The well greased nut worked properly this time - I'd turned it too hard at first. I felt easier in my mind now, because I'd been terrified of dropping off to sleep and losing my sacks.

Yes, the wind was getting stronger and so were the waves. The seas rose higher and the hollows were deeper; and in spite of these great differences in level the raft sailed wonderfully well.

It was wholly dark. The sky was studded with millions of stars, and the brightest of them all was the Southern Cross. I couldn't see my friend. The night now beginning was very important, because if we were lucky enough to have the wind blowing all the time at this strength, we'd go a long way before tomorrow morning.

As the night wore on, the wind blew harder and harder. Slowly the moon heaved up out of the sea: it was a reddish moon, and when at last it was quite risen I could clearly see those darkish patches that give it the look of a face.

So it was past ten. The darkness grew less and less. As the moon rose higher and higher, so the moonlight increased; the waves shone silvery, and their strange brilliance hurt my eyes. I could not prevent myself from looking at them, but they really stabbed and wounded, for my eyes were already stinging from the sun and the salt water. I told myself I was overdoing it, but nevertheless I smoked three cigarettes straight off, one after another.

The raft was behaving well; this heavy sea suited it and it rose and fell with an easy swing. I could no longer leave my legs stretched out on the sacks, for this sitting position gave me cramps that very soon became intolerably painful.

Of course I was continually wetted up to my middle. My chest was hardly wet at all, and once the wind had dried my sweater no later wave soaked me further up than my belt. My eyes stung more and more. I shut them, and from time to time I dozed 'You mustn't sleep, man!' Easy enough to say: but I couldn't hold out any longer. Hell! I struggled against this huge drowsiness: and every time I came back to full wakefulness it was with a stabbing pain in my head. I brought out my tinder lighter. Every now and then I burned myself, putting the glowing wick on to my right forearm or the side of my neck.

I was seized with dreadful anxiety, and I tried to thrust it aside with all my strength. Was I going to fall asleep? If I fell into the sea, would the cold water wake me up? It was sensible to have tied myself on with the chain. I mustn't lose those two sacks - they were my very life now. It would be so bloody silly to fall into the wet and then never wake up again.

For some minutes now I'd been absolutely soaked. A stray wave, one that ran across the path of the others, had struck me on the right-hand side. Not only did it soak me, but it set me askew on the sea, and the two next ordinary waves covered me from head to foot.

This second night was well on towards its end. What time could it be? Judging from the way the moon was beginning to dip towards the west it must be about two or three in the morning. We had been at sea for five tides now, that is to say thirty hours. This soaking I had just had was useful in a way - the cold woke me up completely. I was shivering, but it was longer an effort to keep my eyes open. My legs were very stiff and I decided to sit on them: pulling each in turn with both hands I managed to fold them under me. Maybe my frozen toes would thaw in that position.

I sat there cross-legged for a long while. The change of attitude did me good. The moon lit up the sea wonderfully, and I tried to catch sight of Sylvain; but as it moved down the sky the moon was right in my face, and I found it hard to make anything out distinctly. No, I could see nothing. Sylvain had had nothing to tie himself on with: who could tell whether he was still there on his raft? I searched the sea desperately, but in vain. There was a strong wind, but it was steady -- the important thing was that there were no sudden gusts. I'd grown used to its rhythm, and I sat on my sacks as though I were part of them.

I stared all round so hard and for so long that in the end I had only this one idea in my head -- I must see my buddy. I dried my fingers in the wind and then I whistled through them as hard as ever I could. I listened. No reply. Did Sylvain know how to whistle with his fingers? I didn't know. I ought to have asked before we set off. After all, we could easily have made a couple of whistles. I blamed myself for not having thought of it. Then I put my hands each side of my mouth and called 'Hoo-hoo!' The only answer was the cry of the wind and the slap-slap of the waves.

I couldn't bear it any more, so I stood up and balanced there, holding my chain in my left hand, during the time five waves raised me one after the other. When I reached the crests I stood quite straight, and on the up and then again on the down I squatted. Nothing to the right, nothing to the left, nothing in front. Was he perhaps behind me? I didn't dare stand up and look back. The only thing I had been able to make out without the least possible doubt was a hard shadow away on my left, deep black in the moonlight. It was certainly the forest.

When it was daylight I should see the trees, and think of that did me good. 'At sunrise you'll see the forest, I hope to God you see your friend too!'

I rubbed my toes and stretched out my legs. Then I decided to dry my hands and smoke a cigarette. I smoked. What time was it? The moon was getting very low. I could remember how long before sunrise the moon had set there.

before. I tried to bring it back by closing my eyes and seeing the happenings of that first night. No good. Yes it was, though! All at once I had a clear vision of the sun rising in the east and at the same time the tip of the moon just visible on the western horizon. So it must now be about five o'clock. The moon took its time to sink. The Southern Cross had disappeared long before; so had the Great and Little Bears. There was only the North Star that shone brighter than the rest. Since the sinking of the Southern Cross the North Star had reigned supreme.

The wind seemed to be increasing. At least there was more body in it than during the night, as you might say. This meant the waves were both taller and deeper and there were more white horses on their crests than there had been when the night began.

Thirty hours now that I'd been at sea. There was no denying that up until now things had gone well rather than otherwise, and that the toughest day was the one that was now about to dawn.

Being exposed to the full sun yesterday from six in the morning until six at night had baked me quite horribly. It was going to be no sort of fun when the sun rose again today to have another go at me. My lips were already cracking, and yet this was still the cool of the night. My lips and eyes burned painfully. It was the same with my hands and forearms. If I could manage it I wouldn't expose my arms any more. I'd have to see whether I could bear my sweater. Another place that hurt badly was between my anus and my thighs: in that case it wasn't the sun but the salt water and the rubbing of the sacks.

Still and all, brother, cooked or not, you've made your break all right and it's worth putting up with all this and more to be where you are. You've got a ninety per cent chance of reaching the mainland alive and hell, that's something, isn't it? Even if I were to get there burnt bald and half flayed, that wouldn't be too high a price to pay for such a voyage and such a result. And then again I hadn't seen a single shark. Can you imagine that? Were they all on holiday? You can't deny that as lucky characters go, you're a lucky character all right. This is the true, the genuine break - you'll see. All the others were too carefully laid on, too perfectly organized: the one that really works will be the craziest of them all. Two sacks of coconuts and go wherever the wind and the sea carry you. To the mainland. You must admit you don't have to go to college to know that driftwood always ends up on the shore.

If the wind and the drive of the sea kept going during the day with the same strength as it had during this last night we'd reach land in the afternoon for sure.

The ogre of the tropics rose up behind me. It looked as though he was thoroughly determined to fry everything to a crisp today, for he came up in a blaze of glory. In the flash of an eye he had dispelled the moonlight, and he was not fully risen from the sea before he made it clear who was master — who was the unquestioned king of the tropics. In no time at all the wind grew warm. In an hour it was going to be really hot. A feeling of well-being filled my whole body: the first rays had hardly reached me before a gentle warmth flooded through me from my middle upwards. I took off my towel-turban and held my cheeks out to the sun, as I would have held them out to a log fire. Before scorching me, the ogre meant to show how he was the giver of life before being death itself. My blood flowed faster along my veins, and even my water-soaked thighs felt this new life racing through them.

I could see the bush quite clearly — I mean the very tops of the trees, of course. It seemed to me that it was no great way off. I'd wait a little longer for the sun to rise more and then I'd stand up on my sacks to see if I could catch sight of Sylvain.

In less than an hour's time the sun was well up: God above, it was going to be hot! My left eye had half gummed up. I scooped up water and rubbed my eye with it — how it stung! I took off my sweater. I'd keep it off for a while, until the sun began to burn too fiercely.

A higher wave than the rest heaved up beneath me, raising me right up into the air. In the split second that it was at its highest I saw my friend. He was sitting on his raft, stripped to the waist. He didn't see me. He was less than two hundred yards away, to my left and a little in front. The wind was still blowing strongly, so seeing he was ahead of me almost directly down-wind, I decided to put my arms into the sleeves of my sweater and hold them up, gripping the bottom of it with my teeth. This kind of sail would surely carry me along faster than he was going.

I sailed in this way for about half an hour. But the sweater hurt my teeth and the strength I had to exert, holding it up, was wearing me out too fast. Still, when I gave over I had the impression that I'd gone faster than if I'd just left it to the waves.

Hurrah! I'd just seen Sylvain. He wasn't a hundred yards away. But what was he up to? It didn't look as though he was worrying about whether I was there or not. When another wave heaved me well up I saw him again, once, twice, three times. I distinctly saw he was shading his eyes with his right hand: so he must be searching the sea. Look back, you bloody fool! He had certainly looked, that was for sure; but he hadn't seen me.

I stood up and whistled. When I rose up again from the hollow of the wave there I saw Sylvain standing up and facing me. He waved his sweater. We waved good morning at least twenty times before we sat down again. We signalled at the top of every rising wave, and it so happened we were both going up and down in the same rhythm. On the last two waves he stretched his arm out towards the bush, which could now be seen in detail – it was only about six miles away. I lost my balance and collapsed, sitting on my raft. The sight of my friend and the bush so close at hand filled my whole being with joy – I was so moved I wept like a child. The tears cleaned my gummed-up eyes, and through them I saw countless facets of every colour; stupidly I thought, 'Why, you would say it was stained glass windows in a church.' God is with you today, Papi. It is in the midst of the elements, of nature – the vastness of the ocean, the never-ending waves, the tremendous green roof of the forest – that one feels so infinitely small in comparison with everything around; and it is perhaps then that without looking for Him one finds God – lays one's very hand upon Him. Just as during the thousands of hours I had spent buried alive in those dismal black-holes without a ray of light I had felt Him in the darkness, so today by the light of this rising sun (rising to devour everything not strong enough to withstand Him) I truly touched God: I felt Him all about me and within me. He even whispered in my ear, 'You are suffering and you will suffer even more; but this time I have decided to be on your side. I promise you that you will be free and that you will be free.'

I had never had any religious instruction; I didn't know

ABC of the Christian religion; I was so ignorant that I didn't know who was Jesus's father nor whether His mother was really the Virgin Mary; nor whether His father was a carpenter or a camel driver – but all that gross ignorance does not prevent one from meeting God when one really looks for Him: He is to be found in the wind, the sea, the sun, the jungle, the stars, and even in the fishes that He must have scattered with so free a hand so that man might be fed.

The sun rose fast. It must be ten in the morning. I was completely dry from the waist upwards. I soaked my towel again and wrapped it round my head. I put on my sweater, because my shoulders, back and arms were burning horribly. And although my legs were very often in the water, they too were as red as lobsters.

Now that the coast was nearer, the indraught was greater and the waves ran almost straight towards the shore. I could see the details of the forest, and that made me think that merely in these four or five morning hours we had moved in a great deal. My first break had taught me how to calculate distances. When you can see details clearly, you're less than three miles away: now at present I could tell the difference between the thickness of one trunk and another; and once, from the crest of a particularly high wave, I very clearly saw a huge monster of a tree lying over sideways, with its leaves dipping into the sea.

Dolphins and birds! God send that the dolphins don't play with my raft, pushing it around. I'd heard that they have a way of shoving driftwood and men in towards the shore and of drowning them by pushing with their noses, all with the best intentions in the world, since they only mean to help. No: although there were three or four of them and they circled round and round, it was only to see what it was all about, and they went away without even touching my raft. Thank God for that!

Noon, and the sun was right over my head. The bastard must certainly mean to boil me alive. My eyes were oozing continuously and the skin had quite gone from my lips and nose. The waves were choppier and now they were running in towards the shore with a deafening noise.

I could see Sylvain nearly all the time. He scarcely ever disappeared – the waves weren't deep enough. There was a kind of bar where they broke with a shocking din; and then, once they were over this foaming barrier, they drove right in to attack the forest.

We were about half a mile from the shore and I could make out the pink and white birds with aristocratic plumes, walking about and thrusting their beaks into the mud. There were thousands and thousands of birds. Scarcely any of them flew higher than about six feet, and these short, low flights were merely to avoid being wetted by the spray. There was spray everywhere and the sea was a filthy yellow muddy colour. We were so close in that I could see the dirty high-water mark on the trunks of the trees.

The crash of the rollers did not drown the shrill cry of these myriads of many-coloured waders. Thump. Thump. Then two or three yards further. Thump. I had grounded - I was aground on the mud. There was not enough water to float me. By the sun, it was two in the afternoon. So it was forty hours since I had left. That had been two days back, at ten at night, when the ebb had been running for two hours. So this was the seventh tide, and it was natural that I should be stranded, for this was the ebb once more. The flood would start to run at about three. By nightfall I should be in the bush. I'd keep the chain so as not to be swept off the sacks at the most dangerous moment - the time when the rollers began breaking over me without floating the raft, the sea not being deep enough. I shouldn't be afloat before the tide had been flowing for at least two or three hours.

Sylvain was more than a hundred yards over on my right, and somewhat ahead. He looked at me and waved his arms about. It seemed to me he was trying to shout something but his throat couldn't produce any sound; otherwise I should have heard him. Now that the noise of the rollers had died away behind us there we were on the mud with no sound apart from the cry of the waders. As for me, I was about five hundred yards from the forest: Sylvain was a hundred or a hundred and fifty yards away from me and farther in. But what was the bloody great fool doing now? He was standing up, and he had left his raft. Surely he hadn't gone out of his mind? He mustn't start walking or he'd sink in a little more with every step and maybe he wouldn't be able to get back to his raft. I tried to whistle: I couldn't. There was a little water left so I emptied the bottle: then I tried to shout to stop him. I couldn't utter a sound. Bubbles of gas were coming up out of the mud. So it was only a thin crust with ooze beneath, and any guy that let himself be caught in it – his number would be up for sure.

Sylvain turned round; he looked at me and made signs I couldn't understand. I waved furiously, meaning 'No, no! Don't stir from your raft! You'll never get to the forest!' As he was the far side of his sacks of coconuts, I couldn't make out whether he was near the raft or far from it. At first I thought he must be very close, and so if he bogged down he'd be able to catch hold of it.

All at once I realized that he'd gone quite a distance – that he'd sunk in and couldn't get himself out and so back to his raft. I heard a shout. I lay flat on my sacks, dug my hands into the mud and heaved with all my strength. My sacks moved forward beneath me and I managed to slide along for twenty yards. I'd moved over to the left and it was then, standing, with the sacks no longer blocking my view, that I saw my friend, my buddy, buried to the waist. He was more than ten yards from his raft. Terror gave me back my voice and I shouted 'Sylvain! Sylvain! Don't move! Lie flat in the mud. Get your legs out if you can.' The wind carried my words along and he heard them. He nodded his head to say yes. I flung myself down again and I heaved at the mud, sliding my raft along. My frantic anxiety gave me superhuman strength and I covered another thirty yards and more. It's true I'd taken over an hour to do it, but I was very close to him now – perhaps fifty or sixty yards. I couldn't see very well.

Sitting up, with my hands, arms and face all covered with ooze, I tried to wipe my left eye – salt mud had got into it and it was burning. It not only stopped me seeing out of that one, but it also spoilt the sight of the other, which had now begun to run, just to make things easier. At last I saw him: he was no longer lying down; he was upright, with only his chest rising from the mud.

The first wave arrived. It passed over me without knocking me off my seat and broke farther up, covering the mud with its foam. It also swept over Sylvain: his chest was still out of the mud. At once the thought came to me – 'The more the breakers come in, the softer the mud will be. I must reach him whatever happens.'

I was seized with the furious energy of a wild animal whose cubs are in danger, and I thrust, thrust, thrust at this mud to reach him, like a mother trying to save her child. He gazed at me without a word or a movement, his eyes fixed on me and mine on him. It was essential not to lose his gaze, and I no longer looked to see where I was to drive in my hands. I dragged myself on a little, but now two rollers had passed over me, quite covering me, and the mud had become thinner: I was moving much slower than an hour ago. A big roller came in, almost smothering me and pulling me off my raft. I sat up to see better. The mud was up to Sylvain's armpits. I was less than forty yards from him. He was gazing intently at me. I saw he knew he was going to die there – the poor unfortunate bastard, bogged down three hundred yards from the Promised Land.

I flattened myself again and dug into the mud – it was almost liquid now. My eyes and his were inseparably joined. He shook his head to say no, don't struggle any more. I went on nevertheless and I was less than thirty yards away when a great roller smothered me under its mass of water and very nearly tore me off my sacks – they floated and moved me five or six yards forward.

When the roller had gone I looked round. Sylvain had vanished. The mud, with its thin layer of foaming water, was perfectly smooth. There was not even my friend's hand showing to say a last farewell. I had an utterly disgusting, brutish reaction, the instinct for self-preservation overcoming all decent feeling. 'You're alive, Papi. You're alone, and when you're in the jungle alone with no friend, it won't be so bloody easy to make a success of this break.'

A roller crashed over my back (for I was sitting up) and brought me back to my senses. It bent me right over and knocked all the wind out of my body – it was minutes before I could draw breath. The raft was driven up a few yards, and it was only then, as I watched the wave dying away far up near the trees, that I mourned for Sylvain. 'We were so close: if only you hadn't moved, brother! Less than three hundred yards from the trees. Why? Just tell me why you did such a bloody fool thing. What made you think that crust was firm enough for you to walk on? The sun? The glare? Who knows? Couldn't you stand the hellish discomfort any longer? How come a man like you couldn't bear a few more hours on the gridiron?'

The breakers came in one after another with a thunderous roar. They were coming in faster, and the waves were bigger. Each one washed right over me, and each one heaved me up a few yards, still leaving me on the mud. At about five o'clock the breakers suddenly changed into flowing sea and I was water-borne, right off the bottom. Now that the waves had some depth beneath them they made almost no noise. The thunder of the breakers died away. Sylvain's raft had already been washed up among the trees. I was set down not too violently, carried up to some twenty yards from the virgin forest. When the wave drew back there I was stranded on the mud again, firmly determined not to stir from my raft until I had hold of a branch or a creeper. Only twenty yards to go. It took more than an hour before there was depth enough for me to be lifted up again and carried into the forest. The roaring wave that carried me up literally flung me in among the trees. I undid the bolt and freed myself from the chain. I did not throw it away: it might come in useful.

In the Bush

I hurried into the forest as fast as I could, before the sun should go down; I made my way half walking, half swimming, for here too there was mud that sucked you down. The water ran far in among the trees and night had fallen before I reached dry land. My nose was filled with the smell of rotting vegetation and there was so much gas that it stung my eyes. My legs were wrapped round and round with stalks and leaves. I still pushed my raft in front of me. At every stop I tried the ground beneath the water, and it was only when it did not give that I went on.

I spent my first night on a great fallen tree. Hundreds of creatures of every kind walked about on me. My body burnt and stung. I put on my sweater, having hauled up my sack and made it fast at both ends to the tree-trunk. I had life inside the sacks, for once I'd opened the coconuts they would provide me with food so that I could hold out. I had my jungle-knife looped to my right wrist. I stretched out exhausted in the crotch of the tree – it made a kind of large hollow or nest – and went to sleep without having time to form a single thought. No: perhaps I did just mutter 'Poor Sylvain' once or twice before I sank right down.

It was the noise of the birds that woke me. The rays of the sun were coming horizontally, shining far in among the trees; so it would be seven or eight in the morning. There was a great deal of sea all round me, so it must be high water. Maybe this was the end of the tenth tide.

That made sixty hours since I'd left Devil's Island. I couldn't make out whether I was far from the sea or not; in any case I was going to wait for the water to go down before I went to the shore to dry myself and take a little sun. I had no fresh water left. There were still three handfuls of coconut meat, and I ate it with very great pleasure. I also rubbed some on my burns – the oil it contained soothed them. Then I smoked two cigarettes. I thought about Sylvain, and this time I did so with no selfishness. Shouldn't I, in the first place, have escaped without any friend? After all, I claimed I could manage all alone – could shift for myself. So in that case it was all one: but my heart was filled with a great sadness and I closed my eyes, as though that would prevent me from seeing my friend going down into the mud. As far as he was concerned it was all over.

I wedged my sack carefully into the crotch of the tree and brought out a coconut. I managed to open two by hitting them as hard as I could on the wood between my legs, bringing them point down so that the shell split open. That was better than using the jungle-knife. I ate a whole one and drank the little over-sweet milk it had. The tide ebbed quickly, and when the water had gone the mud bore me perfectly well as I walked down to the shore.

There was a brilliant sun and the sea was incomparably beautiful. I gazed for a long while towards the place where I thought Sylvain must have disappeared. I washed in a pool of sea-water, and my clothes and body were soon dry. I smoked a cigarette. One last look towards my friend's grave and I went back into the forest, making my way quite easily. With my sack on my shoulder I pushed in slowly among the undergrowth. In about two hours I came to dry land at last, where the trees showed no sign of flooding or of the tide. Here I would camp and rest completely for twenty-four hours. I'd open the puts one by one, take out the meat and put it all in the sack, ready to be eaten when it was needed. I could have lit a fire, but I thought it wouldn't be wise.

The rest of that day and then the night passed off quietly. The din of the birds woke me at sunrise. I finished taking out the coconut meat, and then, with a very small bundle on my shoulder, I set off towards the east.

Towards three in the afternoon I came across a path. It was a track used either by the men who went out looking for balata - natural rubber - or for timber, or by those who carried supplies to the gold-diggers. It was a narrow path, but it was clean - no branches lying across it - so it must be well used. Here and there I saw the tracks of an ass or an unshod mule. In the dried mud, men's footprints, the big toe clearly marked. I walked until nightfall. I chewed coconut, which both nourished me and quenched my thirst. Sometimes I rubbed my nose, lips and cheeks with well-chewed pulp, mixed with spit. My eyes ran a great deal, and they often gummed up. As soon as I could, I'd wash them with fresh water. As well as the coconuts, my sack held a water-proof box with a piece of common soap, a Gillette razor, twelve blades and a shaving-brush. It had survived the voyage perfectly.

I walked with my machete in my hand, but I did not need to use it, since the path was quite free and open. Indeed, at the sides I noticed places where branches had been trimmed off not long before. A good many people must pass along, so I should have to take great care.

Here the bush was not the same as what I'd experienced during my first break, at Saint-Laurent-du-Maroni. Here the forest was at two levels, and it was not as thick as it was on the Maroni. The first level was vegetation rising fifteen or twenty feet, and then over that there was the forest roof, more than sixty feet above the ground. There was daylight only to the right of the path; on the other side it was almost entirely dark.

I moved along fast, sometimes crossing a clearing where the trees had been burnt either by men or by lightning. I kept an eye on the sun's rays: their slope showed that it was not far from setting. My back was turned towards it, for I was going eastwards. — that is to say, in the direction of the Negro village of Kourou or the prison camp of the same name.

Night would fall suddenly: I mustn't walk in the darkness. I'd push into the forest and find a place where I could lie down. Thirty-yards and more from the path I made myself a bed, cutting smooth leaves from a tree like a banana-palm and sheltering myself with others. I and my bed were perfectly dry, and as luck would have it, no rain fell. I smoked two cigarettes

I was not too tired that evening. The coconut meat satisfied my hunger and kept me going. But my mouth was parched with thirst and my saliva would hardly flow at all.

The second part of the break had begun; and this was the third night without a hitch that I had spent on the mainland. Ah; if only Sylvain were with me! He's not here, brother, and what is there you can do about it? Have you ever needed anyone's advice or support at any time in your life? Are you a leader or a follower? Don't you be a bloody fool, Papillon: apart from natural grief at having lost a friend you're no worse off just because you're alone in the bush. Royale, Saint-Joseph and Devil's Island are far away now; it's six days since you left them. Kourou must have been warned. First the screws in the logging camp and then the darkies in the village. There must be a police post there, too. Was it really sensible to walk towards the village? I knew nothing about its surroundings. The camp lay between the village and the river. That was all I knew about Kourou.

When I was on Royale I thought I'd hold up the first person I came across and force him to take me to the neighbourhood of Inini, the camp for the Chinese with Cuic-Cuic, Chang's brother, among them. Why should I alter my plan? If the people on Devil's Island had made up their minds we'd been drowned, then there'd be no trouble. But if they thought we'd escaped then Kourou would be dangerous. Since it was a logging camp, there'd be a great many Arabs — that is to say, plenty of trackers. Watch out for the manhunt, Papi! Don't slip up. Don't get yourself caught between two fires. You've got to see these characters, whoever they may be, before they see you. Moral: I mustn't walk on the path but through the forest, alongside the track. All today you've been behaving like a bleeding half-wit, rushing about on this path with nothing but a jungle-knife as a weapon. It wasn't so much ignorance as raving madness. So tomorrow I'd walk through the forest.

I got up early, woken by the birds and the animals greeting the sunrise – indeed, I got up at the same time as the rest of the jungle. Another day was beginning for me too. I swallowed a well-chewed handful of coconut. I rubbed some over my face and started on my way.

Although I was very close to the path I could not be seen: the going was hard, because though the creepers and branches were not very thick I still had to push them aside to get along. Still, it had been very wise to leave the track, because I heard someone whistling. Ahead of me the path ran straight for a good fifty yards: I could not see the whistler. Ha, here he was! A coal-black Negro. He had a pack on his back and a gun in his right hand. He was wearing a khaki shirt and a pair of shorts: legs and feet bare. He walked with his head down, his back bowed under his bulky load, and his eyes on the ground.

I hid behind a big tree on the very edge of the path and waited with my knife open in my hand until he reached me. The second he passed the tree I flung myself upon him. My right hand caught his gun arm and twisted it: the gun dropped. 'Don't kill me! Oh God, have mercy!' He stood there with my knife-point against the lower left side of his throat. I bent and picked up the gun, an old single-barrelled job, but one that was certainly crammed with powder and shot to the muzzle. I cocked it, stood back a couple of paces and said, 'Undo your pack: drop it. Don't you try and run or I'll kill you like a dog.'

The poor petrified black obeyed. Then he looked at me. 'You're an escaped convict?'

'Yes.'

'What do you want? Take everything I have. But I beg you not to kill me – I've got five children. Leave me my life, for pity's sake.'

'Shut up. What's your name?'

'Jean.'

'Where are you going?'

'I'm carrying stores and medicines to my two brothers: they're cutting wood in the bush.'

'Where do you come from?'

'Kourou.'

'Do you belong there?'

'That's where I was born.'

'Do you know Inini?'

'Yes. Sometimes I do a deal with the Chinese in the prison camp.'

'Do you see this?'

'What is it?'

'A five hundred franc note. Take your choice, brother: either you do what I say and I give you these five hundred francs and hand you back your gun, or you refuse or try to deceive me. And in that case I kill you. Make your choice.'

'What have I got to do? I'll do anything you say, even for nothing.'

'You must take me to somewhere near Inini camp without my running any danger. When I've got into touch with a Chinese you can go. OK?'

'OK.'

'Don't you try to pull a fast one on me or you're a dead man.'

'No, I swear I'll help. I'll be straight with you.'

He had some condensed milk with him. He brought out six tins and gave them to me, together with a two-pound loaf and some bacon.

'Hide your pack in the bush: you can pick it up later. Look, I'll mark this tree with my machete.'

I drank a tin of milk. He also gave me a new pair of trousers - workingman's blue trousers. I put them on, never leaving hold of the gun.

'On your way, Jean. Take care no one sees us, because if they do it'll be your fault. And in that case, you've had it.'

Jean was better at going through the bush than me and I found it hard to keep up, so clever he was at avoiding branches and creepers. The nimble bastard went through the jungle with the greatest of ease.

'You know, they've been told at Kourou that two convicts have escaped from the islands. So I must tell you ~~something~~ - it'll be very dangerous for you when we go by near the Kourou prison camp.'

'You seem a straightforward type, Jean. I hope you won't let me down. What do you think is the best way of getting to Inini? Remember that my safety means ~~that the screws~~ the screws or the trackers come to kill you.'

'What should I call you?'

'Papillon.'

'Right, Monsieur Papillon. We ought to go deep into the bush and get round a long way from Kourou. I'll guarantee to take you to Inini through the forest.'

'I'll trust you. Take whatever path you think the safest.'

Right inside the forest we went slower, but ever since we had left the neighbourhood of the path I felt that the Negro was more relaxed. He didn't sweat so heavily and his face was less tense: he seemed much calmer.

'It looks to me you're not so frightened now, Jean?'

'That's right, Monsieur Papillon. Being on the edge of the track was very dangerous for you, and so for me too.'

We were getting along fast. He was bright, this darkie: he never moved more than three or four paces from me. 'Stop. I want to roll a cigarette.'

'Here's a packet of Gauloises.'

'Thanks, Jean, you're a good fellow.'

'That's true: I am very good. I'm a Catholic, you understand, and it grieves me to see the way the white warders treat the convicts.'

'Have you seen many? Where?'

'In the Kourou logging camp. It wounds your heart to see them dying slowly, eaten away by the labour of wood cutting and by the fever and dysentery. You're better off on the islands. This is the first time I've ever seen a prisoner in perfect health, like you.'

'Yes: it's better on the islands.'

We'd sat down for a while on a big branch. I offered him one of his tins of milk. He said he'd rather have some coconut.

'Is your wife young?'

'Yes, she's thirty-two. I'm forty. We have five children, three girls and two boys.'

'Do you earn a decent living?'

'I get along fairly well with the rosewood, and my wife washes and irons for the warders. That helps a little. We're very poor, but we all have enough to eat and the children all go to school. They've always got shoes to put on.'

Poor Negro, he thought everything was fine just because his children had shoes to their feet. He was almost my size and there was nothing at all unpleasant in his black face. Far from it: you could see in his eye that he had feelings that did him honour – he was hard-working, healthy, a good father, a good husband, a good Christian.

‘And what about you, Papillon?’

‘I’m trying to make myself a new life. These last ten years I’ve been buried alive, and yet I’ve escaped again and again – so as to be like you one day – free, with a wife and kids, without doing anyone any harm, even in thought. As you said yourself, the penal settlement is rotten through and through, and a man with any self-respect must get out of that filth.’

‘I’ll help you to succeed – I’ll not let you down. Let’s go.’

Jean had a wonderful sense of direction, and without any hesitation he led me straight to the neighbourhood of the Chinese camp: we got there about two hours after nightfall. We heard far-off noises: we saw no lights. Jean said that to get really close to the camp we should have to avoid one or two outposts. We decided to stop for the night.

I was dead with tiredness; yet I was afraid to sleep. What if I was wrong about the Negro? Suppose he’d been playing a part? Suppose he took the gun while I was asleep and killed me? He’d gain double by doing so: in the first place he’d get rid of the danger I represented, and in the second he’d get a reward for having killed an escaped convict.

Yes, he was very intelligent. Without a word, without waiting about, he lay down to go to sleep. I still had the chain and the bolt. I felt like putting it on him, but then I reflected that he could undo the nut as easily as I could and that if he were to move carefully while I slept flat out, I’d feel nothing. I’d try not to go to sleep. I had a whole packet of Gauloises. I’d do anything to keep awake. I couldn’t put myself into this man’s hands – after all, he was honest and he would certainly have put me down as a crook.

The night was completely dark. He was lying a couple of yards from me and all I could see was the paleness of the soles of his feet. The forest has its own particular night noises – one is the hoarse, powerful cry of the howler monkey, which can be heard for miles. It’s very important, because if the howl is regular it means the rest of the band can eat and sleep in peace. It’s not an alarm or a danger call; it says that there are neither wild animals nor men around.

I was all tensed up, and with the help of some cigarette burns and above all the thousands of mosquitoes that were determined to extract every last drop of my blood, I held out against sleep without too much difficulty. I might have kept the mosquitoes off by rubbing myself with a mixture of spit and nicotine, but I knew I'd drop off without them to keep me awake. I just hoped there were no carriers of malaria or yellow fever among them.

So here I was, no longer on the way down the drain - perhaps only for the moment, but at all events away from it. In 1931, when I'd been arrested, I was twenty-five. Now it was 1941. Ten years. It was in 1932 that that prosecutor Pradel had uttered an inhuman and pitiless indictment to throw me, young and strong as I was, into that pit they call the prison system, a pit full of a sticky liquid that was to dissolve me slowly and cause me to disappear. Now I'd brought off the first part of this break. I'd climbed from the bottom of the pit to its edge. I must concentrate all my intelligence and all my strength so as to bring off the second part.

The night passed slowly, but pass it did; and I did not go to sleep. I never even put down the gun. With the burns and the stinging of the mosquitoes I stayed so thoroughly awake that it never once dropped from my hands. I had the right to feel pleased with myself: I'd not risked my freedom by giving way to fatigue. Mind had triumphed over matter and I congratulated myself upon that fact when I heard the first bird-calls that announced the coming of the day. These early risers were soon joined by hundreds of others.

The Negro stretched his whole length and then sat up. 'Good morning,' he said, rubbing his feet, 'didn't you go to sleep?'

'No.'

'That was stupid, because I promise you you had nothing to fear from me. I've really made up my mind to help you to succeed.'

'Thanks, Jean. Does it také long for the daylight to get into the forest?'

'It won't be here for more than an hour yet. It's only the animals that can tell the dawn's coming so far ahead. Down here we'll be able to see pretty well in an hour's time. Lend me your knife, Papillon.'

I held it out to him without hesitating. He took two or three paces and cut off the branch of a cactus. He gave me one piece and kept the other for himself.

'Drink the water it has in it and rub some on your face.'

Using this strange sort of a basin I drank and washed. Daylight was coming. Jean gave me back the knife. I lit a cigarette and Jean had one too. We set off. We had to wade through a good many very difficult patches of marsh, and then, without having met anyone, friend or enemy, we reached the outskirts of the Inini camp at about midday.

It was a regular highway that we came to. On one side of the broad clearing there ran a narrow-gauge railway 'It's a line with nothing but trucks pushed by the Chinese,' he told me. 'The wheels make a terrible noise and you can hear them a great way off.' We were there when one went by: it had a bench with two screws sitting on it. Behind there were two Chinese with long poles to act as brakes. Sparks flew from the wheels. Jean told me the poles were tipped with steel and they were used either for pushing with or braking.

There were a great many people on the road. Chinese went by, some carrying coils of creeper on their shoulders, some a wild pig, and others bundles of palm fronds. They all looked as though they were going to the camp. Jean told me there were many reasons for them to go out into the forest - hunting game, looking for creepers to make furniture with, or palm fronds for the mats that shaded the vegetable gardens from the burning sun, catching butterflies, insects, snakes, etc. Some Chinese were allowed to go into the forest for a few hours once they had finished the work they were set. They all had to be back before five o'clock in the afternoon.

'Here, Jean. Here's the five hundred francs and your gun [I'd already unloaded it]. I've got my knife and my machete. You can go now: and thanks. I hope God will reward you better than I can for having helped an unfortunate bastard to try and make a new life. You've been dead straight, so thanks again. I hope when you tell your children all about this you'll say, "The convict looked a decent type; I'm not sorry I helped him."'

'Monsieur Papillon, it's late. I couldn't get far before night-fall. Keep the gun: I'll stay with you until tomorrow morning. If you don't mind, I'd rather it was me that stopped the Chinese to go and tell Cuic-Cuic - you pick him out. He won't be so frightened as if he saw a white man on the run. You let me go out on the road. Even if a screw turns up, he won't think it strange to see me here. I'll say I'm looking for roseood for the Symphorien Company in Cayenne. Rely on me.

'Well, in that case take your gun - an unarmed man in the orest would look queer.'
'That's true.'

Jean stood there on the road. I was going to give a low whistle when a Chinese I liked the look of came along.
'Good day, Mouché,' said a little old Chinaman in pidgin-French: he was carrying what must certainly be a length of cabbage-palm on his shoulder - delicious eating. I whistled, because this polite old man who greeted Jean first seemed to me the right sort.

'Good day, Chink. Stop: me want talk to you.'
'What you want, Mouché?' he asked, stopping.

They talked together for close on five minutes. I couldn't hear what they said. Two Chinese went by, carrying a big deer on a pole: it hung from its feet, and its head dragged along the ground. They went by without greeting the Negro, but they said a few words in Chinese to their countryman, who made a short reply.

Jean brought the old man into the trees. He came towards me, holding out his hand. 'You makee break?'

'Yes'

'Where from?'

'Devil.'

'Good, good.' He laughed, staring at me with his slit eye.

'Good, good. What your name?'

'Papillon.'

'Me not know.'

'Me, friend of Chang. Chang Vauquien, Cuic-Cuic brother.'

'Oh? Good, good.' He shook my hand again. 'What want?'

'Tell Cuic-Cuic me waiting here.'

'No can do.'

'How come?'

'Cuic-Cuic him steal sixty ducks belong head of camp go to kill Cuic-Cuic. Cuic-Cuic him run'

'How long ago?'

'Two month.'

'Gone by sea?'

'No can tell. Me go to camp, talk other Chinaman' friend of Cuic-Cuic. Him say what to do. You no go away from here. Me come back tonight.'

'What time?'

'Don't know. But me come, bring food, cigarettes: you no lightee fire here. Me whistle La Madelon. When you hear, you come out on road. Savvy?'

'Me savvy.' He disappeared. 'What do you think about it, Jean?'

'There's no harm, because if you like we'll go straight back the way we came to Kourou and I'll find you a canoe, some food and a sail so that you can get away by sea.'

'I'm going very far, Jean: it wouldn't be possible to set off alone.' But thanks for your offer. If the worst comes to the worst I'll accept it.'

The Chinese had given us a big piece of cabbage-palm, and we ate it. It was fresh and very good indeed - a strong nutty flavour. Jean was going to keep watch: I felt quite sure of him. I daubed my face and hands with tobacco-juice, for the mosquitoes were beginning their attack.

Jean shook me awake. 'Papillon, someone's whistling La Madelon.'

'What's the time?'

'Not late: maybe nine o'clock.'

We went out on to the road. The night was very dark. The whistler came nearer and I answered. He came closer still: we were very near, but I couldn't see him. We each whistled in turn, and presently we came together. There were three of them. Each shook me by the hand. The moon would be rising soon.'

'Let's sit here by the side of the road,' said one of them in perfect French. 'No one can see us in the darkness.' Jean came with us. 'Eat first; we'll talk afterwards,' said the educated Chinese. Jean and I ate some piping hot vegetable soup. It warmed us through and through and we decided to keep the rest of the food for later. We drank hot sweet tea that tasted of mint - it was delicious.

'So you're a close friend of Chang's?'

'Yes. He told me to come and look for Cuic-Cuic so we could escape together. I've already made a break that took me a very long way - as far as Colombia. I'm a good sailor, and that's why Chang wanted me to take his brother. He trusts me.'

'I see. What are Chang's tattoo marks?'

'A dragon on his chest and three spots on his left hand. He told me those three spots meant he was one of the leaders of the rising at Pulo-Condor. His best friend was another leader of the rising called Van Hue. He's lost an arm.'

'That's me,' said the educated one. 'You're certainly a friend of Chang's, and that means you're our friend. Listen: Cuic-Cuic has not been able to get out to sea yet because he doesn't know how to sail a boat. He's alone: he's in the bush, about five miles from here. He makes charcoal. Friends sell it for him and give him the money. When he's saved enough he'll buy a boat and look for somebody who'll escape with him by sea. He's in no danger where he is. He's on a kind of island surrounded by treacherous mud and no one can get on to it. Anyone who doesn't know the way through the marsh would be sucked down. I'll fetch you at dawn and take you to Cuic-Cuic. Come with us.'

We went along the edge of the road, because the moon had risen and it was light enough to see anyone at fifty yards. When we reached a wooden bridge he said, 'Shelter under this bridge. Sleep here and I'll come and fetch you tomorrow morning.'

We shook hands and they went off. They walked along quite openly: if they were found they were going to say they had been out to look at traps they had set in the bush during the day. Jean said to me, 'Papillon, don't you sleep here. You sleep in the bush and I'll stay. When he comes I'll call you.'

'Fine.' I went back into the bush and with my belly full of good soup I dropped off happily after I'd smoked a few cigarettes.

Van Hue was at the meeting place before sunrise. To gain time we were going to walk on the road until daylight. We went along fast for about forty minutes. Then suddenly there was the sun and far off we could hear the noise of a truck coming towards us down the line. We got under cover.

'Good-bye, Jean, and good luck. God bless you and your family.' I made him take the five hundred francs. In case things went wrong with regard to Cuic-Cuic, he told me how to reach his village, and how to get round it and post myself on the path where we'd met in the first place. He had to go along it twice a week. I shook hands with that great-hearted Guiana Negro and he leapt on to the path.

'Let's go,' said Van Hue, thrusting his way into the forest. He steered without hesitation and we moved along fairly quickly, for the bush was not very thick. When branches and creepers got in his way he did not cut them with his machete. He pushed them aside.

Cuic-Cuic

In something under three hours there we were in front of a great pool of mud. Floating on the ooze, water-lilies and plants with great flat green leaves. We walked along the bank.

Van Hue saw me trip and said, 'Take care you don't fall, because if you do you sink for good - no hope whatsoever.'

'Go ahead. I'll follow you and take more care.'

There was a little island ahead of us, perhaps a hundred and fifty yards away. Smoke was rising from the middle. Those must be the charcoal mounds. I detected a crocodile in the mud, with only its eyes showing: What could it possibly live on, there in that marsh?

We walked another half mile along the bank of this sort of mud-lake. Van Hue stopped and began singing very loudly in Chinese. A man came towards the edge of the little island. A small man, wearing nothing but a pair of shorts. The two Chinese began talking. It went on and on and I was getting impatient when at last they stopped.

'Come this way,' said Van Hue. I followed him, and we went back the way we had come. 'It's all right: that was a friend of Cuic-Cuic's. Cuic-Cuic has gone hunting, but he'll be back soon. We have to wait for him here.'

We sat down. In less than an hour's time Cuic-Cuic appeared. He was a little dried-up bastard, Annamite yellow, with heavily lacquered teeth - almost shining black: he had an open, intelligent look.

'You're my brother Chang's friend?'

'That's fine. You can go, Van Hue.'

'Thanks,' said Van Hue.

'Here, take this bird with you.'

'No thanks.' He shook my hand and left.

Cuic-Cuic led me along: there was a pig that walked in front of him. He followed this pig very carefully. 'Take great care, Papillon. Put a foot wrong, make the slightest mistake and you're in the mud. If there's an accident, one can't help the other, because that would only mean two instead of one being sucked down. The way across is never the same, because the mud shifts; but the pig always finds a path. Only once did I ever have to wait two days before I could get over.'

And indeed the black pig sniffed the mud and paced swiftly out on to it. The Chinese spoke to the pig in his own language. I followed, quite taken aback at the sight of this little creature obeying him like a dog. Cuic-Cuic watched closely, and I stared, fascinated. The pig crossed to the other side without ever sinking in more than a few inches. My new friend hurried after the pig, saying 'Tread in my footsteps. We've got to move quick, because the pig's tracks will fade at once.' We crossed without any difficulty. The mud never came up higher than my calves; and that was only towards the end.

The pig had made two long detours, and this forced us to walk over the crusted mud for more than two hundred yards. Sweat poured off me. I can't say I was just frightened: I was absolutely terrified. During the first part of the crossing I wondered whether it was my fate to die as Sylvain had died. I could see him again, poor chap, in his last moments: and although I was as wide awake as possible and although I could see his body all right, his face seemed to have my features. How that crossing put me through the mangle! I won't forget it in a hurry.

'Give me your hand.' And the little skin-and-bone Cuic-Cuic helped me climb up on to the bank.

'Well, mate, the trackers aren't likely to come for us here!'

'Oh, as far as that's concerned you can rest easy.'

We made our way into the little island. The smell of charcoal gas caught my throat. I coughed. It was the two smoking mounds. There was no danger of my being eaten alive by mosquitoes here. Down-wind, with the smoke all round it there was a hut, its roof and walls made of plaited fronds - carbet. It had a door, and in front of this door stood the little Indo-Chinese I'd seen before we met Cuic-Cuic.

'Good afternoon, Mouché.'

'Talk to him in French, not pidgin,' said Cuic-Cuic. 'He's a friend of my brother's.'

The Chink, a half-portion of a man, inspected me from head to foot. Satisfied with his examination, he held out his hand, his gap-toothed mouth spread in a smile. 'Come in and sit down.'

This single room, this kitchen, was clean. There was something cooking over the fire in a big pot. Only one bed: it was made of branches, and it stood at least three feet from the ground.

'Help me to make a place for him to sleep tonight.'

'Yes, Cuic-Cuic.'

In less than half an hour there was my bunk. The two Chinese laid the table and we ate some splendid soup, then white rice and meat cooked with onions.

This chap, Cuic-Cuic's friend, was the one who sold the charcoal. He didn't live on the island and so at nightfall Cuic-Cuic and I were alone together.

'Yes, I stole all the commanding officer's ducks, and that's why I'm on the run.'

We were sitting one on each side of the little fire, and from time to time the flames lit up our faces. We looked hard at one another, and each, talking about himself, tried to find out what the other was like.

There was almost no yellow in Cuic-Cuic's face: the sun had turned it nearly copper coloured. His very slanting bright black eyes looked me straight in the face when he spoke. He smoked long cigars he rolled himself, using black leaf. I went on smoking cigarettes, making them with the rice-paper the one-armed man had given me.

'So I made a break, seeing the chief, the ducks' owner, meant to kill me. That was three months ago. The worst of it is, I've gambled away not only the money for the ducks but everything from the two charcoal kilns.'

'Where do you play?'

'In the bush. The Chinese from the Inini camp and the discharged prisoners from Cascade get together every night.'

'You've made up your mind to get away by sea?'

'That's the one thing I aim at; and by selling charcoal I thought I'd be able to buy a boat and then find a man who knew how to sail it and who'd like to go off with me. But in three weeks time there'll be more charcoal to sell and then we'll buy a boat and set off in it, since you understand the sea.'

'I've got money, Cuic-Cuic. We don't have to wait for the charcoal to buy a boat.'

'That's fine, then. There's a good boat for sale at one thousand five hundred francs. It's a Negro, a wood-cutter, who's selling it.'

'You've seen it, then?'

'Yes.'

'Well, I'd like to see it too.'

'Tomorrow I'll go and see Chocolate, as I call him. Tell me about your break, Papillon, will you? I thought it was impossible to escape from Devil's Island. Why didn't my brother Chang come with you?' I told him all about the break, the wave called Lisette, and Sylvain's death. 'I can see Chang didn't want to go with you. It was terribly risky. You have luck on your side, that's the only reason you've reached here alive. I'm glad of it.'

Cuic-Cuic and I talked for more than three hours. We turned in early, because he wanted to go and see Chocolate at daybreak. We put a big log on the fire to keep it in all night and went to bed. The smoke caught my throat and made me cough, but there was the advantage that not a single mosquito came in.

Lying there on my pallet with a good warm blanket over me, I closed my eyes. But I could not go to sleep. I was too excited. Yes, the break was going well. If the boat was good, I'd be at sea in under a week. Cuic-Cuic was a small, lean type, but he must have uncommon strength and great powers of resistance. He was certainly dead straight with his friends, but he would be very cruel to his enemies, for sure. It is difficult to make out an Asiatic face — it gives nothing away: but his eyes spoke in his favour.

I dropped off and I dreamt of a sunlit sea with my boat tearing happily through the waves on its way to freedom.

'Would you like coffee or tea?'

'What do you drink?'

'Tea.'

'Give me tea, then.'

Dawn was just beginning to break: the fire had kept in overnight and water was boiling in a pot. There was the cheerful sound of a cock crowing. No other bird-cries anywhere near us: no doubt the smoke of the charcoal heaps kept them away. The black pig was lying on Cuic-Cuic's bed. It went on sleeping, which seemed to me to show idleness. Dampers made of rice flour were cooking in the ashes. When he'd given me some sugared tea, my mate cut a damper in two, spread it with margarine and gave it to me. We made a huge breakfast. I ate three well-cooked dampers.

'I'm off: come a little way with me. If anyone calls or whistles, don't you answer. You're in no danger - it's impossible for anyone to reach this place. But if you show yourself on the bank you might get shot.'

His master called him and the pig got out of bed. It ate and drank. Then it walked out, with us following. It went straight towards the mud. Some way from the place we landed the day before, it went down. It paced out for about ten yards and then turned back. It didn't like the mud there. It tried three times and then it found the right crossing. At once Cuic-Cuic hurried without any hesitation over to the mainland.

He didn't intend to come back until the evening. He'd put the soup on the fire and I ate it by myself. Then I found eight eggs in the hen-run and made a little omelette with three of them, using margarine. The wind had changed and the smoke from the heap opposite the hut drove away to one side. In the afternoon I lay there, sheltering comfortably from the rain on my bed of branches, and the charcoal gas did not worry me at all.

During the morning I walked about all over the island. There was quite a big clearing near the middle. The fallen trees and the piles of logs showed that this was where Cuic-Cuic got the wood for his mounds. I also found a pit of white clay where he must certainly take the earth he needed to cover the heaps and prevent them from burning away. The hens pecked about in the clearing. A huge rat darted away from under my feet, and a few yards farther on I found a dead snake nearly six feet long. The rat must just have killed it.

I made a whole series of discoveries during this day alone on the island. For instance, I found a family of ant-eaters. The mother and three little ones. They were in the middle of a huge ant-hill, with ants milling about in every direction. And then there were a dozen very small monkeys, leaping from tree to tree in the clearing. They were marmosets, and when I appeared they uttered heart-breaking cries.

Cuic-Cuic came back that evening. 'I didn't see Chocolate or his boat, either. He must have gone to get stores at Cascade, the little village where his house is. Did you have enough to eat?'

'Yes.'

'Would you like some more?'

'No.'

'I've brought you two packets of ration tobacco. That's all there was.'

'Thanks. It doesn't matter. When Chocolate goes to the village, how long does he stay?'

'Two or three days: but still I'll go tomorrow and every day after that, because I don't know when he left.'

The next day the rain came pouring down in torrents. That did not prevent Cuic-Cuic from setting off completely naked, with his clothes under his arm wrapped in a piece of oilskin. I didn't go with him. 'It's not worth your getting wet too,' he said.

The rain stopped. From the sun I could see it was between ten and eleven o'clock. One of the two heaps, the farther one, had caved in under the enormous downpour. I went over to have a look at it. The rain had not put the fire out altogether. Smoke was still rising from the shapeless mound. All at once I rubbed my eyes and stared again - I could hardly believe what I had just seen. Five shoes protruding from the charcoal. I realized at once that these shoes, upright on their heels, each had a foot and a leg in it. So there were three men cooking away in the heap. I don't have to spell out my first reaction. Chancing on a thing like that sends a shiver right down your back. I bent over, and kicking the half charred wood aside I found the sixth shoe.

That Cuic-Cuic is a fast worker: as soon as he does any characters in, he reduces them to ashes by wholesale. It was so striking that to begin with I walked away from the heap and into the clearing. I needed the warmth of the sun. Yes, suddenly, in that stifling temperature, I felt cold through and through and I had to have the tropical sun to warm me.

Reading this, you may think it unnatural; you may think I ought to have been in a muck-sweat after making a discovery like that. Well, no: I was utterly chilled, frozen spiritually and physically. It was not until long after, almost an hour, that the sweat started pouring down my face, because the more I thought about it the more it seemed a miracle to me that I was still alive, seeing I'd told him I had a lot of money in my charger. Or was he maybe reserving me for the bottom of a third mound?

I remembered how his brother Chang had told me Cuic-Cuic had been convicted of piracy and murder aboard a junk. When they attacked a vessel with the idea of robbing it they wiped out the whole family - always on so-called political grounds, of course. So these were characters who were already quite used to wholesale killings. And then again, I was a prisoner here. I was in a queer sort of a position, all right.

Let's get things straight. If I kill Cuic-Cuic here on the island and stuff him into the heap in his turn, nobody's any the wiser. But the pig won't obey me: not so much as a word of French does this fool of a tame pig understand. So there's no way of getting off the island. If I turn a gun on him, the Chink will obey me: but then, having got off the island, I'll be forced to kill him on the other side. If I throw him into the mud, he'll vanish: but there must be some reason why he burns these types rather than tosses them over the bank, which would be so much easier. As far as the screws are concerned, I don't give a hoot in hell, but if his Chinese friends find out I've killed him, they'll turn man-hunters, and with their knowledge of the bush it wouldn't be any sort of fun having them after me. Cuic-Cuic's only got a single-barrelled muzzle-loader. He never lets go of it, not even when he's cooking. He sleeps with it and he even carries it with him when he leaves the hut to relieve himself. I must keep my knife open all the time of course: but even so, I have to sleep sometimes. Well I did make a splendid choice of a companion to escape with didn't I?

I couldn't eat all day. And I'd still not made up my mind when I heard somebody singing. It was Cuic-Cuic coming back. Hidden behind the leaves I watched him. He had a bundle balanced on his head, and when he was very close to the bank I showed myself. With a smile he handed me a package wrapped up in a flour sack, climbed up beside me and hurried towards the hut. I followed him.

'Good news, Papillon: Chocolate's back. He's here.'

boat. He says it'll carry more than half a ton, without sinking. The things you're carrying are flour sacks to make a mainsail and a jib. This is the first bundle. Tomorrow we'll bring the rest, because you'll come with me and see whether you like the boat.' Cuic-Cuic said all this without turning round. We were walking in a line. The pig first, then him and then me. It occurred to me that it didn't look as though he was planning to stuff me into the charcoal, seeing that he was going to take me to see the boat tomorrow and since he was already beginning to spend money on the escape - he'd bought these flour sacks. 'Why, a heap has caved in. The rain, I dare say. It doesn't surprise me, all this bleeding wet.'

He didn't even turn aside to go and look at the heap but went straight into the hut. I couldn't tell what to say, or what decision to make. Pretending not to have seen anything wouldn't wash. It would seem unnatural never to have stepped over to the charcoal mound, a mere twenty-five yards from the hut, all day long.

'You let the fire go out?'

'Yes. I didn't notice.'

'But you haven't had anything to eat?'

'No. I wasn't hungry.'

'Are you sick?'

'No.'

'Then why didn't you eat the soup?'

'Cuic-Cuic, sit down. I've got to talk to you.'

'Let me just light the fire first.'

'No. I want to talk to you right away, while it's still daylight.'

'What's the matter?'

'Those three men in the charcoal heap - now it's fallen in they show. Tell me about it, will you?'

'Oh, that's why you were so upset!' And quite unmoved he looked me straight in the eye. 'After you'd seen that, you were uneasy in your mind. I understand you perfectly well; it's natural enough. Indeed, it was lucky for me you didn't knife me from behind. Listen, Papillon, those three men were trackers. Now a week ago, or rather ten days to be exact, I sold Chocolate a fair amount of charcoal. The Chinese you saw helped me get the sacks off the island. It's a tricky business: we have two hundred yards of rope or more and we slide a little train of sacks over the mud. I'll keep it short. Between here and the little channel where Chocolate's canoe was lying, we left a good many traces. Some worn old sacks had leaked charcoal. That was when the first tracker started hanging about. I could tell from the noises the animals made that there was someone in the bush. I saw the character without him seeing me. It wasn't difficult to cross over, make a half circle and come up behind him unawares. He died without ever seeing who killed him. As I'd noticed that some days after a body has sunk into the mud it comes up again, I carried him here and put him into the charcoal.'

'And what about the other two?'

'That was three days before you came. The night was very dark and silent, which is uncommon here in the bush. These two had been moving round the marsh since nightfall. When the smoke drifted towards him, one of them coughed from time to time. That was how I knew they were there. Before dawn I risked a crossing on the far side from where I had pinpointed the cough. As for the first tracker, to keep things short, I just cut his throat. He didn't even have time to scream. The other one, who had a gun, was stupid enough to let me see him - he was too taken up with staring into the bush on the island, trying to see what was happening over there. I shot him, and then seeing he wasn't dead I slid my knife into his heart. There, Papillon, that's the story of the three stiffes you found in the charcoal. Two were Arabs and one was French. It was very tricky getting over the mud with a corpse on my shoulder. They were heavy, and I had to make two journeys. In the end I managed to get them all into the mound.'

'And that's really how it happened?'

'Yes, Papillon, I swear that's exactly how it was.'

'Why didn't you chuck them into the mud?'

'As I just told you, the mud throws up corpses. Sometimes big deer fall in and then a week later they come to the surface again. They stink until the vultures have eaten them. It takes quite a while, and the vultures flying about and making a noise brings people to look. I swear to you, Papillon, you've nothing to be afraid of with me. Listen, take the gun, if that would make you any happier.'

I had a wild desire to accept but I fought it down, and as naturally as I could I said, 'No, Cuic-Cuic. I'm here because I feel I'm with a friend - perfectly safe. But you'll have to burn the trackers again tomorrow, because who can tell what'll happen when we leave this place? I don't want anyone to accuse me of three murders, even if I'm not here.'

'OK, I'll burn them again tomorrow. But don't you worry, no one will ever set foot on this island. It's impossible to get over without sinking in the mud.'

'And what if they use a rubber dinghy?'

'I hadn't thought of that.'

'If someone brought the gendarmes here and they took it into their heads to cross to the island, believe me they'd cross with a rubber dinghy all right. And that's why we must get out as soon as we possibly can.'

'Right. Tomorrow we'll light the mound again – in any case it's not gone right out. All we have to do is to make two holes for the air.'

'Good-night, Cuic-Cuic.'

'Good-night, Papillon. And I say again, sleep well – you can trust me.'

With the blanket pulled up to my chin, I luxuriated in its warmth. I lit a cigarette. Not ten minutes later, Cuic-Cuic was snoring. And there was the heavy breathing of his pig, lying there next to him. There were no more flames, but the tree-trunk on the hearth glowed red every time the breeze wafted into the hut, and this glow gave me a feeling of peace and calmness. I delighted in this comfort and I dropped off thinking, 'Either I wake up tomorrow, and in that case everything will be fine between Cuic-Cuic and me; or else the Chinese is a better actor than Sacha Guitry, a marvel at hiding what he means to do and at telling tales, and in that case I shall never see the sun again, because I know too much – I might be dangerous to him.'

The specialist in mass-murder woke me, a mug of coffee in his hand; and as though nothing had happened he wished me good morning with a wonderfully cordial smile. Dawn had broken. 'Here, drink your coffee and have a damper – it's already spread.'

When I'd eaten and drunk I washed outside, taking water from a barrel that was always full.

'Will you give me a hand, Papillon?'

'Yes,' I said, without asking what he wanted me to do.

We pulled the half burnt corpses out by their feet. I didn't say anything, but I noticed that all three of them had had their bellies opened: the kindly Chinese must have rummaged through their guts to see whether they had chargers. Were they in fact trackers? Man hunters? Why might not they have been after butterflies or game? Had he killed them to protect himself or to rob them? Enough of that. They were back in a hole in the mound, well covered with wood and clay. We opened two passages for the air and the heap went back to its two jobs – making charcoal and turning the three stiffs into cinders.

‘Let’s go, Papillon.’

The little pig quickly found a crossing. Hurrying along one after the other we passed over the mud. I could not overcome my dread at the moment of setting out upon it. Sylvain’s end had made such an appalling impression on me that I could not set foot on the marsh with an easy mind. At last, the cold sweat running off me, I darted after Cuic-Cuic. I walked carefully in his footsteps. There was no reason why I should sink: if he got over, I could get over.

Rather more than two hours of walking brought us to the place where Chocolate was cutting wood. We’d met nobody in the bush and so we’d never had to hide.

‘Good-day, Mouché.’

‘Good-day, Cuic-Cuic.’

‘OK?’

‘Fine. How are you?’

‘Show my friend the boat.’

It was a very strong-built boat, something like a lighter. It was very heavy, but it was solid. I dug my knife in all over it: nowhere did the point go in more than a quarter of an inch. The planking was sound, too. It had been made of the very best quality wood.

‘What are you asking for it?’

‘Two thousand five hundred francs.’

‘I’ll give you two thousand.’ It was a deal. ‘This boat has no keel. I’ll give you an extra five hundred francs, but you’ve got to fix a keel, a rudder and a mast. Hardwood keel and rudder. The mast, ten foot of light whippy wood. When will it be ready?’

‘In a week.’

‘Here are two thousand franc notes and one five hundred. I’m going to cut them in two and I’ll give you the other half on delivery. You keep these three halves. Right?’

‘Yes.’

'I want some permanganate, a keg of water, cigarettes and matches, stores for four men for a month – flour, oil, coffee and sugar – I'll pay for them separately. You must hand everything over to me on the river, on the Kourou.'

'Mouché, I can't take you down to the mouth of the river.'

'I never asked you to. All I said was to deliver the boat on the river and not in this creek.'

'Here are the flour sacks, some rope, needles and sail thread.'

Cuic-Cuic and I went back to our hide-out. We got there without any trouble before nightfall. On the way back he carried the pig on his shoulders, because it was tired.

The next day I was alone, busy sewing the sail, when I heard shouts. I went towards the mud, hiding behind the trees, and looked over to the opposite bank: Cuic-Cuic and the Chinese intellectual were arguing and waving their arms. It seemed to me that the intellectual wanted to cross to the island and Cuic-Cuic was against it. Each had a machete in his hand. The one-armed man was the more excited of the two. Christ, he mustn't kill Cuic-Cuic on me! I decided to show myself. I whistled. They turned towards me.

'What's up, Cuic-Cuic?'

'I want to talk to you, Papillon,' shouted the other. 'Cuic-Cuic won't let me across.'

After another ten minutes of argument in Chinese the pig walked in front of them and they both came over to the island. We sat in the hut with mugs of tea in our hands, and I waited until they should make up their minds to speak.

'Well,' said Cuic-Cuic, 'this is what it's all about: he wants to come on the break with us, cost what it may. I keep telling him it's not for me to make any decision – you're the one who pays and who gives all the orders. He won't believe me.'

'Papillon,' said the other, 'Cuic-Cuic just has to take me with him.'

'How come?'

'Because two years ago he cut off my arm in a fight over a card-game. He made me swear not to kill him. I swore on one condition – he'd got to feed me all my life long, or at least whenever I insisted upon it. Now if he goes off, I'll never see him again as long as I live. That's why he's either got to let you go alone or he's got to take me with him.'

'Well, for God's sake! Now I really have seen everything.'

Listen, I'm quite willing to take you. It's a big, solid boat, and we could take more if we wanted. If Cuic-Cuic agrees, you can come.'

'Thanks,' said the one-armed man.

'What do you say, Cuic-Cuic?'

'Fine, if you want it that way.'

'There's one important thing. Can you get out of the camp without being reported missing and reach the river before night? Will they think you've escaped and send out a search-party?'

'No difficulty there at all. I'm allowed out at three in the afternoon, and I can get to the river bank in under two hours.'

'Cuic-Cuic, would you be able to find the place in the dark, for us to take your friend aboard, losing no time?'

'Oh, no sort of doubt about it at all.'

'Come here in a week's time and I'll tell you what day we leave.'

Delighted, the one-armed man shook my hand and went away. I watched them as they said good-bye to one another on the far bank – they shook hands before separating. So that was all right. When Cuic-Cuic was back in the hut I said, 'That was a quaint sort of agreement you made with your enemy, feeding him for the rest of his life. I've never heard of such a thing. What did you cut his arm off for?'

'It was in a fight about cards.'

'It would have been better to have killed him.'

'No, because he's a very good friend of mine. When I was brought up in front of the court-martial because of the squabble, he stood up for me right through – he said he'd attacked me and I'd only acted in self-defence. I accepted the agreement of my own free will and I must never let him down in any way. The only thing is I didn't like to mention it to you because you're the one that's paying for this whole break.'

'OK, Cuic-Cuic, let's not talk about that any more. Once we're free, God willing, it'll be up to you to do what you think's right.'

'I'll keep my word.'

'What do you reckon you'll do, supposing we do get free one of these days?'

'A restaurant. I'm a very good cook and he's a specialist in chow mein.'

This whole business put me in a good temper. It ny from beginning to end that I couldn't help teasing Cuic-Cuic about it from time to time.

Chocolate kept his promise: in five days everything was ready. We went through a driving rain storm to look at the boat. All in order. The mast, rudder and keel had been fitted extremely well, and they were made of the finest wood. The boat was waiting for us with its water-barrel and the stores in a backwater. All that was needed now was to let Van Hue know. Chocolate said he would go to the camp and tell him. So that we shouldn't have to run the risk of coming in to the side to pick him up, Chocolate would take him directly to the hide-out.

The mouth of the Kourou river was marked by two lights. If it was raining we could run out right in the middle of the stream without any risk – the sails furled, of course, so as not to be picked up. Chocolate gave us some black paint and a brush. We were to paint a big K on the mainsail and the number 21. K21 was the registration number of a fishing-boat that sometimes went out at night. If we were seen hoisting the sail as we put out to sea, they would take us for the other boat.

It was for tomorrow evening at seven, an hour after night-fall. Cuic-Cuic assured me he had found a path that would take us to the hiding-place for sure. We'd leave the island at five so as to have an hour's daylight to walk in.

We were in very high spirits as we went back to the hut. Cuic-Cuic walked along in front of me, carrying the pig on his shoulder, and he never stopped talking. 'At last I'm going to get clear of prison,' he said, without turning round. 'It's thanks to you and my brother Chang. Maybe one day, when the French have left Indo-China, I'll be able to get back to my own country.'

In short, he believed in me; and the knowledge that I liked the boat made him as happy as a sandboy. I slept on the island for the last time – my last night, I hoped, on the soil of Guiana.

If I could get away from the river and out into the open sea, it was certain freedom. Shipwreck was the only danger; for now that the war was on no country handed back escaping fugitives. In that respect at least, the war had been of some use to us. If the French caught us, we were condemned to death, true enough: but they had to catch us first. I thought of Sylvain: if he hadn't made that mistake he'd have been here by my side now. I dropped off, composing this cable: 'Monsieur

Pradel, public prosecutor: at last I have conquered. I have left the sewer you flung me into, left it for ever. It has taken me nine years.'

The sun was quite high by the time Cuic-Cuic woke me up. Tea and dampers. There were boxes all over the place. I caught sight of two wickerwork cages. 'What are you going to do with them?'

'They're for the hens, so we can eat them on the voyage.'

'You're crazy, Cuic-Cuic! We can't take the hens.'

'But I'm going to take them, though.'

'Are you out of your mind? What if the ebb only takes us out round about daybreak and the cocks and hens start cackling out there on the river – don't you see the danger?'

'Me no leave hens.'

'Cook them then, and put them up in their own fat and some oil. They'll keep, and we'll eat them during the first three days.'

Persuaded at last, Cuic-Cuic went out to fetch the hens; but the noise of the first four made the others smell a rat, because he was never able to catch the rest – they all vanished into the bush and hid. I can't tell how they had foreseen the danger, but they had – mystery of nature!

Loaded like pack-horses we crossed the mud behind the pig. Cuic-Cuic had begged me to take it with us.

'Can you give me your word the creature won't make a noise?'

'I promise you he won't. When I give the word he is quite silent. Two or three times we've been hunted by a jaguar – the jaguar circling round to take us unawares – and he's not made a sound. And yet every bristle on his body was on end.'

I was sure that Cuic-Cuic was telling the truth, so I agreed to take his beloved swine aboard. It was dark by the time we reached the hiding-place. Chocolate was there with Van Hue. I checked everything with a couple of electric torches. There was nothing missing: the parrels of the sail were already shipped and the jib was in its place, ready to be set. I showed Cuic-Cuic how to hoist it and he went through the motions two or three times. He quickly grasped what I wanted of him. The Negro had behaved wonderfully; I paid him: he was such a simple-minded creature that he had brought gummed paper and the other halves of the notes – he asked me to stick them together for him. Never for a moment had it occurred to him that I might take the money back. When people don't think evil of others, it means they're decent and straightforward themselves. Chocolate was a fine man, honest and direct. He'd seen how the convicts were treated, and he had no sort of hesitation in helping three of them escape from that hell.

'Good-bye, Chocolate. Good luck to you and your family.'

'Thank you very much.'

The Break with the Chinese

I got in last: Chocolate shoved us off and the boat moved out into the stream. No paddles, but two good oars: Cuic worked one in the bows and I worked the other. In less than two hours we reached the main river.

It had been raining for the last hour and more. A painted flour sack was my oilskin, and Cuic and Van Hue each had one too. The Kourou was running fast, and it was full of eddies, but in spite of the current we were in the middle of the stream within an hour. Three hours later, with the ebb-tide carrying us, we passed between the two lights. I knew the sea was near at hand, because they stood on the farthest points of the estuary. With our jib and mainsail set, we ran out of the Kourou without the slightest hitch. The wind took us on the beam with such force that I was obliged to pay the sheet right out. We ran abruptly into the sea, racing through the narrow strait: rapidly the shore dropped away behind us. Twenty-five miles ahead, the lighthouse on Royale gave us our position. Thirteen days ago I was behind that light, on Devil's Island. My two Chinese companions did not burst out into cries of delight at this clean break with the mainland, at getting out to sea in the darkness. The Orientals do not express their feelings in the same way that we do. Speak'ng in an ordinary voice, once we were well out, Cuic-Cuic merely observed, 'We managed that very well,' and that was all.

Van Hue added, 'Yes: we got out to sea without anything going wrong.'

'Cuic-Cuic, I want a drink. Pass me a little tafia.' They poured some out for me and then they knocked back a stiff tot themselves.

I'd set off without a compass, but my first break had taught me how to navigate by the sun, the moon, the stars and the wind, so without hesitation I brought the mast to bear on the North Star and headed straight out to sea. The boat handled rose easily to the swell and scarcely rolled at all. The sea was very strong, and by the morning we were a great way from the coast and from the Iles du Salut. If it hadn't been so dangerous I should have run in towards Devil's Island to have a good stare at it as I sailed by, sitting there at ease.

For six days we had had a heavy swell, but no rain and no violent wind. The stiff breeze had carried us westward at a good speed. Cuic-Cuic and Hue were excellent shipmates. They never complained either of the rough sea, or of the sun, or of the cold at night. There was only one thing – neither would I put a finger on the tiller or take over the boat for a few hours so that I could sleep. They produced something to eat three or four times a day. All the hens and the cocks made their way into the pot. Yesterday, by way of a joke, I said to Cuic, 'Where are we going to eat the pig?'

He took it terribly to heart. 'That creature is my friend, and before anyone kills him he'll have to kill me first.'

My companions took great care of me. They gave up smoking so that I should have as much tobacco as I wanted. There was hot tea ready all the time. They did everything without having to be told.

We had been gone a week. I was at the end of my tether. The sun was beating down with such strength that even my Chinks were done an elegant brown. I just had to sleep. I lashed the tiller and left the boat with the merest scrap of sail – it could go wherever the wind took it. I slept like one of the dead for four hours.

A harder thump than usual started me violently out of my sleep. When I dipped my face into the water I had the pleasant surprise of finding that Cuic had shaved me while I was asleep – I'd felt nothing. He'd also put oil on my face.

Since yesterday evening I'd been steering west by south because it seemed to me I'd made too much northing. The heavy boat not only held the sea well, but it also made little leeway. That was why I thought I'd got too far to the north seeing that I'd reckoned on a good deal of drift when making the first time in my life I'd ever seen one. It didn't look though it was coming towards us and it was too far off to be able to tell how big it was. Its aluminium-coloured side shone like the sun with such a silvery brilliance that you could look at it for long. Now it had changed direction and it looked as though it was steering for us. Yes: it grew larger and larger and in less than twenty minutes it was over our heads. Cuic and Hue were so astonished at the spectacle that they never stopped jabbering in Chinese.

'For Christ's sake, talk French, so I can understand you.'

'English sausage,' said Cuic.

'No, it's not exactly a sausage: it's an airship.'

The huge contraption was so low now that we could see every detail: it kept turning above us in narrow circles. Flags came out and made signals. We couldn't understand, so we couldn't reply. The airship went on signalling, coming even closer – so close we could see the people in the cabin. Then it went straight off in the direction of the land. Less than an hour later an aeroplane appeared and passed over us several times.

The swell had increased and quite suddenly the wind had strengthened. The horizon was clear all round, so there was no danger of rain.

'Look,' said the one-armed man.

'Where?'

'That black speck over there where the land should be. That speck is a ship.'

'How do you know?'

'I'm sure of it: and I'll go so far as to say it's a fast destroyer.'

'Why?'

'Because it's making no smoke.'

And indeed after a long hour we could very clearly see a grey man-of-war apparently coming straight for us. It grew bigger and bigger, which meant it was coming at an enormous speed, and its bows were pointing directly at us – so much so that I was afraid it would shave us too close. That would be dangerous, because with the heavy seas running across its wake it might sink us.

It began a turn, showing us its side, and we saw its name, the Tarpon. The destroyer, with the English flag at its bows, finished its turn and came gently towards us, stern first. It moved alongside, keeping to the same speed as us. Most of the crew were on deck, dressed in the blue of the Royal Navy. On the bridge an officer in white with a loudspeaker hailed us in English, 'Heave to. Heave to at once.'

'Lower the sails, Cuic.'

In under two minutes mainsail, foresail and jib were down.

With the sails furled we hardly moved at all, except that the waves kept heaving us sideways. I could not stay long in this position without danger: a boat with no motion of its own, either from sails or motor, doesn't obey the helm. It's very dangerous when the sea is high. Putting my hand up to my mouth I shouted, 'Do you speak French, Captain?' Another officer took the loud-hailer. 'Yes, Captain, I understand French.'

'What do you want with us?'

'We want to hoist your boat aboard.'

'No, it's too risky: I don't want my boat smashed up.'

'We are a man-of-war on patrol. You just have to obey.'

'I don't give a damn: the war's nothing to do with us.'

'Aren't you survivors from a torpedoed ship?'

'No, we've escaped from the French bagne.'

'What's a bagne? What do you mean, with your bagne?'

'Prison, gaol. In English convict. Hard labour.'

'Oh, yes. I understand. Cayenne?'

'Yes, Cayenne.'

'Where are you going?'

'British Honduras.'

'That's impossible. You must steer by west and go to Georgetown. That's an order.'

'OK.' I told Cuic to haul up the sails and we set off in the direction given by the destroyer.

We heard the noise of a motor behind us: it was a boat from the man-of-war and it very soon overtook us. There was a sailor with a rifle slung over his shoulder standing in the bows. The boat came up on our starboard side, just shaving us, neither stopping nor asking us to stop. With one step the sailor came aboard: the boat went on and turned to rejoin the destroyer.

'Good afternoon,' said the sailor. He came and sat down at my side. Then he took the tiller and steered rather more south than I had been going. I gave the steering over to him, watching how he did it. He knew how to handle a boat, there was no sort of doubt about that. In spite of it all I stayed where I was. You never know.

'Cigarettes?' He took out three packets of English cigarettes and gave us one each.

'God above,' said Cuic, 'they must have given him these the moment he got into the boat: he certainly wouldn't have been walking about with three packets on him.'

I laughed at Cuic's remark and then went back to ~~waiting~~ the English sailor, who was better at managing a boat ~~than~~ I was. I had plenty of time for reflection. This time the ~~break~~ had succeeded for good and all. I was free, free. A warmth flooded up from my heart and indeed I believe my eyes filled with tears. It was true: here I was, free for ever, because now the war was on no country ever handed fugitives back.

Before the war was over, I'd have time to make myself known and liked in any country where I happened to have settled. The only difficulty was that maybe the war would prevent me from choosing the country where I'd like to live. That didn't matter at all: wherever I lived my conduct would soon win the authorities' and the people's trust and esteem. My behaviour must be and would be irreproachable. Even more: it would be exemplary.

This feeling of security, of having at last overcome the way down the drain, was so great that I thought of nothing else. You've won at last, Papillon! After nine years you've come out on top. Thank you, Lord: You might have done it sooner, but Your ways are mysterious and I have no complaints, because thanks to Your help I'm still young and healthy, and I'm free.

I was still reflecting upon the distance I'd come during these nine years of penal, plus the two served in France before – a total of eleven – when I looked where the sailor was pointing as he cried, 'Land!'

At four in the afternoon, having passed an unlit lighthouse, we ran up an enormous river, the Demerara. The ship's boat reappeared: the sailor handed back the tiller and went into the bows. He caught the tow-line they threw and made it fast to the thwart. He lowered the sails himself, and gently towed by the boat we went about ten miles up the yellow river, with the destroyer following two hundred yards behind. A boat in the stream, and then a big town appeared. 'Georgetown' said the English sailor.

This was the capital of British Guiana, and the boat ~~towed~~ us slowly in. A great many merchant ships, launches and ~~war~~ of-war. Guns in turrets, standing on the banks of the ~~river~~. What with these and all the others aboard the ~~navy~~ ~~ships~~ was a positive arsenal.

It was war time. The war had been going on for ~~years~~ but I had not really been conscious of it. ~~Georgetown~~ capital of British Guiana, was an important port on the Demerara river, and it was in the war up to its neck – involved a hundred per cent. I found it very queer indeed, this feeling of a town under arms. We had scarcely touched the naval landing-stage before our accompanying destroyer came smoothly in and moored beside us. We climbed up on to the wharf, Cuic and his pig, Hue with a little bundle in his hand, and me without anything at all. No civilians at all at this Royal Navy landing-place: only soldiers and sailors. An officer I recognized came up. He was the one who'd talked to me in French from the bridge of the destroyer. Kindly he held out his hand and said, 'Are you pretty fit?'

'Yes, Captain.'

'Fine. Still, you'll have to go to the infirmary and have some injections. And your two friends as well.'

Life in Georgetown

In the afternoon, after they had given us several shots, we were transferred to the central police-station, a kind of headquarters with hundreds of policemen continually going in and out. The chief of the Georgetown police, the authority directly responsible for public order in this considerable port, received us in his office right away. Around him there were English officers in khaki, impeccable in their shorts and white stockings. The colonel motioned us to sit down in front of him, and speaking excellent French he said, 'Where were you coming from when you were picked up at sea?'

'From the penal settlement in French Guiana.'

'Please tell me exactly where you escaped from.'

'I escaped from Devil's Island. The others from the semi-political camp at Inini, near Kourou in French Guiana.'

'What was your sentence?'

'Life: for manslaughter.'

'And the Chinese?'

'Manslaughter too.'

'Their sentence?'

'Life.'

'Your trade?'

'Electrician.'

'And theirs?'

'Cooks.'

'Are you for de Gaulle or Pétain?'

'We know nothing about that at all. We're just men from prison trying to make ourselves a new life – to go straight and live free.'

'We'll give you a cell that will be open day and night. We'll let you out when we've looked into your statements. You've nothing to fear if you've told the truth. You must understand that we're at war and that we have to take even more care than usual.'

To cut it short, in a week's time they set us free. We'd taken advantage of this spell in the police-station to get some decent clothes. At nine one morning there we were in the street, my two Chinamen and me, properly dressed and carrying identity-cards with our photographs on them.

This was a town of two hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants, and it was almost entirely built of wood in the English way – ground floor masonry and the rest wood. The streets and avenues were stiff with people of every race, white, brown and black men, Indian, coolies, English and American sailors, Scandinavians. Our heads swam as we walked about in this multi-coloured crowd. We were filled with an overflowing happiness – our hearts were so full of it that it must have showed in our faces, even in Cuic's and Hue's Chinese faces, because several people looked at us and smiled kindly.

'Where are we going?' asked Cuic.

'I've got a sort of address. A black policeman told me where two Frenchmen live, at Penitence Rivers.'

As I understood it, it was a district in which only Indians lived. I went up to a policeman in spotless white and showed him the address. Before answering he asked for our identity-cards. Proudly I showed them. 'Thank you; that's fine.' Then he took the trouble to put us on to a tram, having spoken to the conductor. We left the middle of the town and after twenty minutes the conductor told us to get out. This must be the place. We questioned people in the street, saying 'Frenchmen?' A young fellow made signs for us to follow him and he led us straight to a little one-storeyed house. As soon as I went towards it three men came out with welcoming gestures.

'Can it be you, Papi? How in God's name did you get here?'

'It's just not true!' cried the oldest, the one with snow-white hair. 'Come on in. This is my place. Are the Chinese with you?'

'Yes.'

'Come in, all of you. You're very welcome.'

The old convict was called Auguste Guittou: he was born and bred in Marseilles and he'd crossed in the 1933 convoy with me, aboard the Martinière nine years before. After a break that ended badly his main sentence had been commuted, and he told me that it was as a ticket-of-leave man that he had escaped some three years back. Of the others, one was a character from Arles called Petit-Louis; and the third came from Toulon - his name was Julot. They too had gone off after they had served their time; but by law they should have stayed here in French Guiana for the same number of years as they had been sentenced to - ten and fifteen years. That second period was called the doublage.

The house had four rooms, two for sleeping, one for cooking and eating in, and one that served as a workshop. They made shoes out of balata, a kind of natural rubber collected in the bush that could easily be worked and shaped with the help of hot water. The only drawback was that if it was exposed to the sun too long it melted, because the rubber was not vulcanized. They coped with that by putting strips of strong cloth between the layers of balata.

We were welcomed nobly, for they too had suffered, and suffering makes men great-hearted: without a second thought Guittou took us into his house, fixing a bedroom for the three of us. The only point of doubt was Cuic's pig, but Cuic said he was certain it would never make a mess in the house: it would go out all by itself whenever it needed to.

Guittou said, 'All right. We'll see. Keep it with you for the time being.'

And for the time being we settled in with old army blankets on the floor by way of beds. We sat there in front of the door, the six of us, smoking, and I told Guittou all my adventures of the last nine years. He and his two friends listened with all their ears, vividly experiencing everything I had been through, for they had known the same kind of thing, and they knew what it was like. Two of them had been acquainted with Sylvain and they were deeply grieved at his horrible death. Many people of every colour and nationality went up and down in front of us: from time to time one of them would buy shoes or a broom, for Guittou and his friends also made brooms to earn their living. They told me that here in Georgetown, counting both convicts and relégués, there were about thirty who had escaped from penal. At night they met in a bar in the middle of town and drank beer or rum together. Just that they all worked to keep themselves and that most of them behaved well.

While we were sitting there in the shade in front of the door a Chinese passed by, and Cuic called out to him saying anything to me Cuic and Hue went off together: it was clear they were not going far, because streets to get to know the district. Here everything was Indian. Very few blacks, almost no whites, just two or three Chinese restaurants.

Penitence Rivers was its name, and it might have been a little piece of India or Java. The young women were really lovely, and the old men wore long white robes. Many of the people went barefoot. It was a poor district, but everybody was cleanly dressed. The streets were ill-lit; the bars were full of people eating and drinking; and there was Indian music everywhere.

A shining black Negro dressed in white and wearing a tie stopped me. 'You're French, Monsieur?'

'Yes.'

'What a pleasure to meet a fellow-countryman. Will you come and have a drink?'

'All right: but I've two friends with me.'

'That doesn't matter. Do they speak French?'

'Yes.'

There we were all four of us, sitting at a table looking out on to the pavement. This black man from Martinique spoke purer French than we did. He told us to beware of the English Negroes, for, said he, they were all liars. 'They're not like us French: we can be trusted - they can't.'

I smiled inwardly at hearing this coal-black Negro say 'us Frenchmen'. But then immediately afterwards it worried me badly. For indeed this gentleman was French, and it seemed to me he was more French than me, since he laid claim to his country, believing in it wholeheartedly. He was capable of giving his life for France: I wasn't. So he was a more genuine Frenchman than I was. However, I went along with the current. 'Yes, I'm happy to meet a fellow-countryman too, and to talk my own language - I'm very bad at English.'

'I speak it fluently and correctly. If I can be of any use to you, here I am. Have you been in Georgetown long?'

'Only a week.'

'Where do you come from?'

'French Guiana.'

'Really? Are you an escaped prisoner or a warde to join de Gaulle?'

'No, I'm an escaped prisoner.'

'And your friends?'

'The same.'

'Monsieur Henri, I don't want to know anything about your past, but now's the moment to come to the help of France and to redeem yourself. I'm for de Gaulle and I'm waiting for a ship for England. Come and see me tomorrow at the Mariners' Club - here's the address. I'd be glad to have you join us.'

'What's your name?'

'Homère.'

'Monsieur Homère, I can't make up my mind right away. In the first place I've got to find out about my family; and then before taking such an important decision I've got to analyse it. Objectively. You must understand, Monsieur Homère, that France has knocked me about cruelly - treated me in the most inhuman sort of way.'

With splendid zeal and ardour the Martiniquais did all he could to persuade me. It was really moving to hear him produce all these arguments in favour of our poor suffering France.

We went home very late, and as I lay in bed I thought over all this French patriot had said. I had to consider his suggestion very seriously. After all, the cops, the lawyers and the prison service weren't France. I knew in my heart that I hadn't stopped loving my country. And to think there were Huns all over it! Christ, how my people must suffer: how it must humiliate the whole nation.

When I woke up, the donkey, the cart, the pig, Cuic and Van Hue had disappeared.

'Well brother, did you sleep well?' asked Guittou and his friends.

'Yes, thanks.'

'Listen, would you like black coffee or café au lait or tea? Coffee and bread and butter?'

'Yes please.' I ate the lot, watching them at their work. Julot prepared the lump of balata as it was called for: he took hard bits out of the hot water and kneaded them into the soft mass. Petit-Louis cut out the pieces of cloth and Guittou made the shoes. 'Do you turn out many?'

'No. We aim at making twenty dollars a day. Five dollars looks after the rent and the food. That leaves five over for each man's pocket-money, clothes and laundry.'

'Do you sell them all?'

'No. Sometimes one of us has to go out and peddle shoes and brooms in the streets of Georgetown. On foot and in the blazing sun, it's tough.'

'I'd be happy to do it, when it has to be done. I don't want to be a parasite here. I must do something to chip in for the food too.'

'OK, Papi.'

All day long I wandered about Georgetown's Indian quarter. I noticed a big cinema poster and I was seized with a violent longing to see a talking film in colour for the first time in my life. I'd ask Guittou to take me that evening. I walked round and round the streets of Penitence Rivers for hours and hours. I was delighted with the politeness of the people. There were two outstanding things about them - they were clean and they were very polite. I found this day strolling alone through the Hindu district of Georgetown even more exalting than my arrival in Trinidad nine years before.

In Trinidad, in the midst of all the wonderful feelings that arose from mingling with the crowd, there was always this question hanging over my head - 'One day, in two weeks' time or at the very most three, I'll have to go out to sea again: what country will take me in? Will there be any nation that will accept me? What will the future bring?' Here it was quite different. I was free for good and all; if I wished, I could even go to England and enlist in the Free French forces. What should I do? If I made up my mind to join de Gaulle wouldn't they say I'd just come because I didn't know what else to do? Among all those people who'd always gone straight, wouldn't I be treated like a criminal who was on their side because he had no other refuge? They said France was divided in two - divided between Pétain and de Gaulle. How could a Marshal of France possibly not know where honour lay and what was the best for the country? If I joined the Free French, wouldn't I be forced to fight against my own countrymen later on?

It was going to be very hard, very hard, to make a decent living here. Guittou, Petit-Louis and Julie were not so fools and yet they were working for five dollars a week. To begin with, I would have to learn to read and write. I had been a prisoner since 1931; and all these problems the very first day of my freedom. I even know the ABC of making a living. I have never worked with my hands. I am absolutely any workman in the world.

Everybody was happy. Us to begin with, because we knew we could earn our living and not be a burden on our friends. And then Guittou and the two others, who in spite of their kindness must have been wondering how soon we should be able to stand on our own feet.

'Your friends are terrific, Papillon. We'll make a couple of bottles of pastis and celebrate.' Julot went out and came back with sugar-cane, alcohol and various essences. An hour later we were drinking a pastis worthy of Marseilles. Helped on by the alcohol our voices grew louder and our happy laughter was more cheerful and stronger than usual. Some Indian neighbours gathered that there was a party in the Frenchmen's house, and five of them, three men and two girls, came without any sort of ceremony and joined us. They brought skewers of chicken and pork, all very highly seasoned and peppered. The two girls were most remarkably beautiful. They were dressed all in white; their feet were bare; and each wore a silver anklet on her left leg. Guittou said to me, 'Take care. These are good girls. Don't you go and make a pass just because you can see their bare breasts under that veil. It's natural for them. As for me, I'm too old. But Julot and Petit-Louis had a go when we first arrived and they came to grief. The girls wouldn't come to see us again for a long while.'

These two Indians were really lovely. They had a little round tattooed mark in the middle of their foreheads, and that gave them a strange, exotic look. They talked to us kindly, and from what little English I knew I gathered they were bidding us welcome to Georgetown.

That night Guittou and I went down to the middle of the city. You would have said it was another civilization, utterly different from the one we lived in. The town was crammed with people. Whites, blacks, Indians, Chinese, soldiers and sailors in uniform, and a great many merchant marine sailors. Great numbers of bars, restaurants, pubs and night-clubs: and their glare lit up the streets as though it was midday.

That evening I'd been to the first talking film in colour I'd ever seen in my life, and still astonished by this new experience, I followed Guittou into a huge bar. One corner was filled with Frenchmen, at least a score of them. Their drink was Free Cubas - Coca-Cola and spirits. All these men were convicts, escaped convicts. Some had got away after they had been let out: they'd served their sentence and they were supposed to serve their doublage in Guiana. But they starved, they couldn't find jobs, and both the locals and the officials looked upon them with disfavour: they preferred running for it and trying to reach a country where they hoped they'd be able to lead a better life. But it was tough, they told me.

'Take me, for example. I cut timber in the forest for John Fernandes at two dollars fifty a day. I come down to Georgetown for a week every month. I'm desperate.'

'And what about you?'

'I make butterfly collections. I go out after them into the bush and when I've caught a good many of different sorts I arrange them in glass-topped boxes and sell them as a collection.'

Others were stevedores in the port. They all worked, but they only just made enough to live on. 'It's tough; but we're free,' they said. 'And freedom, Christ, it's good.'

That evening a relégué called Faussard came to see us. He stood drinks all round. He'd been on board a Canadian ship carrying bauxite that had been torpedoed in the mouth of the Demerara river. As a survivor he'd been given a sum of money on account of the sinking. Almost the whole of the crew had been drowned: He'd been lucky enough to be able to get into a lifeboat. He told us the German submarine surfaced and spoke to them. It had asked them how many ships were still in the port, waiting to sail with cargoes of bauxite. When they said they didn't know, the man who had been questioning them laughed. 'Yesterday I was in such-and-such a cinema in Georgetown,' he said. 'Look at this half of the ticket.' And it seems he opened his coat and said, 'This suit comes from Georgetown.' Unbelievers said it was just bluff, but Faussard would have it that it was so, and I've no doubt he was telling the truth. He said the submarine even told them what ship was going to come and pick them up: and indeed that very ship did save their lives.

Every man had a tale to tell. Guittou and I were sitting next to an old Parisian from the Halles called Petit-Louis de la rue des Lombards: he said, 'Papillon, I'll tell you what, my old mate, I found a little racket that meant I could live without doing a hand's turn. In the paper there's a heading Died for his King or for the Queen or something like that; and whenever a Frenchman's name appeared I'd go to a mason's yard and take a photo of a tombstone with the name of the ship, the date it was torpedoed and the name of the Frenchman - I painted them on. Then I'd go round to the rich English houses and say they ought to give something for a monument to this Frenchman who'd died for England, so there'd be something in the graveyard to remember him by. It worked perfectly up until last week, when a bloody fool of a Breton, who'd been reported lost, turned up, not only alive but in terrific health. He went to see some of the very women who'd given me five dollars for his memorial - a stiff who went about saying he was alive and that I'd never bought a stone from any mason's yard in my life. I'll have to find something else to live on, because at my age I can't work any more.'

Stimulated by the Free Cubas everyone roared away at full blast, telling the most extraordinary tales: we were all certain we were the only ones who understood French.

'Look at me,' said one guy, 'I make balata dolls and bicycle handles. The only thing is, when the little girls leave their dolls out in the sun in their gardens they melt or go out of shape. Oh, it's a bloody wasps' nest when I forget what street I've already worked. This last month I haven't dared go along half the streets in Georgetown by daylight. The same thing with the bicycles. You leave them in the sun and when you come back your hands stick to the grips I've sold.'

'Or take me,' said another man. 'I use balata too - I make sticks with black girls' heads as decorations. I tell the sailors I'm a survivor from Mers-el-Kébir and that they just have to buy one, because it's not their fault I'm still alive. Eight out of ten fall for it.'

This modern Alsatia made me laugh, but it also made me realize that in fact earning a living was by no means easy. Someone turned on the radio at the bar: it was de Gaulle making a speech. A French voice from London, encouraging the French overseas and in the colonies: everyone listened. It was a moving appeal and nobody uttered a sound. All at once one of the lags who'd had too many Free Cubas sprang up and said, 'Brothers, this is terrific! All of a sudden I understand English! I followed every word Churchill said!' Everyone burst out laughing: not a man there tried to make him see he'd got it wrong.

Yes, I'd have to take my first steps towards earning my own living, and as I could see from the others, it wasn't going to be is didn't weigh on my mind. Between 1930 and 1935 I lost all sense of responsibility and all knowledge of how to make a living. A man who's been a prisoner as long as I have without having to worry about food, rent or clothing, a man who's been put on a lead, managed, shoved around, and grown used to doing nothing off his own bat and to using every kind of order without thinking about it, a man who's grown used to being given food and drink at set hours – a man has to re-learn how to live when all of a sudden he has to put himself in the middle of a big town, no longer knowing how to walk on a pavement without bumping into people or crossing a road without getting himself run over. And then again there are some reactions you'd never expect: for example, among all those different kinds of lags, all talking French sprinkled with English or Spanish words, I was listening as hard as ever I could when suddenly I wanted to go to the lavatory there in that English pub. Well, you'll scarcely believe it, but for a fleeting second I looked round for the warder whose permission I ought to ask. It was very short: but it was also very funny when I understood what was the matter and said to myself, 'Papillon, when you want to have a piss or do anything else, from now onwards there's no one whose permission you have to ask.'

And at the cinema too, when the girl was looking for a place for us, for a moment I felt like saying, 'Please don't you trouble about me. I'm only a mere convict – I'm not worth bothering with.' And going along the street between the cinema and the pub I turned round several times. Guittou knew all about this, and he said to me, 'Why do you keep turning round all the time? Are you looking to see if the screw's following you? No screws here, old Papi: you left them all behind in the penal.'

In the lags' language they say you have to get rid of your convict's shirt. But it's more than that, because prison clothes are only a symbol. It's not only your shirt you have to get rid of, but the brand made with a red-hot iron on your heart and spirit.

A police patrol came into the bar – impeccably-dressed English Negroes. They went round, table by table, asking for identity cards. When they reached our corner the sergeant carefully scanned all the faces. He saw one he didn't know mine. 'Identity card, sir, if you please.' I passed it: he looked me and gave it back, saying, 'Excuse me, I didn't know you. Welcome to Georgetown.' And with that he went away.

When he'd gone, Paul le Savoyard observed, 'These rosbifs are wonderful. The only foreigners they trust a hundred per cent are the escaped lags. If you can prove that you made a break from penal, the English authorities will set you free straight away.'

Although we got home late, I was at the main harbour gate at seven the next morning. Less than half an hour later Cuic and Hue appeared with the little cart full of vegetables gathered that morning, together with eggs and a few chickens. They were by themselves. I asked where their friend was - the Chinese who was to show them how to manage. Cuic said, 'He showed us yesterday. That was enough. Now we don't need anyone.'

'Did you have to go far to find all that?'

'Yes. Two and a half hour's journey and more. We set off at three this morning and we're only just back.'

As if he'd been living there for twenty years, Cuic produced hot tea and then dampers. Sitting on the pavement close to the cart, we ate and drank, waiting for customers.

'Do you think they'll come, your Americans of yesterday?'

'I hope so; but if they don't, we'll sell to other people.'

'What about the prices? How do you fix them?'

'I don't say this costs so-and-so: I say, what'll you give me?'

'But you can't speak English.'

'That's so. But I do know how to use my hands and fingers. Then it's easy enough.'

'Anyhow, you can talk well enough to buy and sell,' said Cuic to me.

'Yes, but first I'd like to see you do it by yourself.'

I didn't have long to wait, because soon there appeared a huge kind of jeep called a command car. The driver, a petty officer and two sailors got out of it. The petty officer climbed into the cart and looked at all the lettuces, aubergines and so on. He inspected every crate and he prodded the chickens.

'How much the lot?' And the bargaining began.

The American sailor talked through his nose. I couldn't understand a word he said. Cuic jabbered away in Chinese and French. Seeing that they'd never come to an agreement I called Cuic aside. 'What did you lay out altogether?' He looked through his pockets and found seventeen dollars. 'A hundred and eighty-three dollars,' he said.

'What's he offering you?'

'Two hundred and ten, I think. It's not enough.'

I went over to the petty officer. He asked if I spoke English. A very little. 'Talk slowly,' I said.

'OK.'

'What do you offer? No, two hundred and ten dollars is impossible. Two hundred and forty.'

He wasn't having any.

He pretended to go and then came back: went off again and got into his jeep. But I had the feeling it was all an act. Just as he was getting out of it again our two pretty neighbours arrived, the Indian girls, half-veiled. They had certainly been watching the scene, because they pretended not to know us. One of them got into the cart. Looked at our wares and said, 'How much the lot?'

'Two hundred and forty dollars,' I replied.

'It's a deal,' she said.

But the American brought out two hundred and forty dollars and gave them to Cuic, telling the Indian girls he'd already bought the stuff. Our neighbours did not go away but stood watching the Americans unload the cart and pile the things into the command car. At the last moment a sailor laid hold of the pig, thinking it was part of the bargain. Naturally Cuic wouldn't have that. An argument began and we couldn't manage to make them understand that the pig was not included in the deal.

I tried to explain to the Hindus, but it was very hard. They couldn't get it either. The American sailors wouldn't let go of the pig: Cuic wouldn't give back the money. The whole thing threatened to degenerate into a brawl. Van Hue had already picked up a shaft when an American military police jeep went by. The petty officer whistled. The military police came over. I told Cuic to give back the money: he wouldn't listen to me for a moment. The sailors still had hold of the pig, and they wouldn't give it back either. Cuic was standing there in front of their jeep, so that they couldn't drive away. Quite a crowd had gathered round this noisy little scene. The military police said the Americans were in the right; and in any case, they couldn't understand a word of our gibberish either. They really believed we had been trying to swindle the sailors.

I was at my wits' end when I suddenly remembered that I had the name of the Negro from Martinique with the telephone number of the Mariners' Club. I showed it to the policeman, saying, 'Interpreter'. He took me to a phone. I put the call through and I was lucky enough to find my Gaullist friend. I asked him to tell the policeman that the pig was not part of the deal, that it was a tame pig, that Cuic looked upon it in the same light as a dog, and that we'd forgotten to tell the sailors it wasn't included. Then I handed the telephone to the policeman. In three minutes he had understood everything. With his own hands he took the pig and gave it back to the delighted Cuic, who caught it in his arms and hurried it into the cart. The whole thing ended well and the Yanks laughed like a pack of children. The crowd dispersed: everybody was happy. Back at the house that night we thanked the Hindu girls, and when they understood what it was all about they too laughed as much as anybody else.

We had been in Georgetown three months now. Today we moved into one half of our Indian friends' house. Two big, airy bedrooms, a dining-room, a little kitchen with a charcoal stove and a huge yard with a corner roofed over with corrugated iron for a stable. The donkey and cart were under cover. I was going to sleep alone in a big second-hand bed with a good mattress. In the next room, each in his own bed, my two Chinese friends. We also had a table and six chairs, as well as four stools. In the kitchen, everything necessary for cooking. We thanked Guittou and his friends for their hospitality and then as Cuic said, we took possession of our own house.

In front of the dining-room window and looking out on to the street there stood a wickerwork armchair in all its glory - a present from the Indian girls. On the table, some fresh flowers in a glass pot, produced by Cuic.

This feeling of being here, in the first home of my own, gave me confidence in myself and in the future. It was a very modest house, but it was clean, light and airy, and it was the fruit of three months of team-work.

Tomorrow was Sunday, and there would be no more work. We'd be free all day long. What's more, we'd all fixed our minds to invite Guittou and his friends as well as the Indian girls and their brothers to dinner. The next day was to be the Chinese who'd helped Cuic and one who'd given the donkey and cart and who'd lent us the two hundred dollars to get going. In his plate he'd find an envelope with the two hundred dollars and a note of thanks from us in Chinese.

After his beloved pig, I was the one who had all Cuic's affection. He was always doing kind things for me - I was the best dressed of the three, and he'd often come home with a present, a shirt, a tie, or a pair of trousers. He bought all these things with his own money. Cuic didn't smoke and he hardly drank at all; his only vice was gambling. He had but one dream - saving up enough to go to the Chinese club to gamble.

We had no real difficulty at all in selling our morning's purchases. I could already speak enough English to buy and sell. Between the three of us, we made twenty-five to thirty-five dollars. It wasn't much, but we were very pleased at having found a way of earning our livings so quickly. I didn't always go out buying, although I made better bargains than they did but now I was always the one that did the selling. There were plenty of English and American sailors, posted ashore to do the buying for their ships, who knew me. We'd talk over the prices pleasantly, not getting too worked up about it. There was one big Italian-American who looked after the supplies for an officers' mess, and he always talked to me in Italian - was delighted when I answered in his own language and only bargained for the hell of it. He always ended up by paying the price I'd asked in the first place.

By about half past eight or nine we were back at the house. Van Hue and Cuic would go to bed after we'd all three had something to eat. As for me, I'd go and see Guittou and her friends or else the Indian girls would call on me. No housework to do: the sweeping, making of beds, laundry, dusting, was all done for us by the two sisters, and they were paid very well for almost nothing - two dollars a day. I fully appreciated what it was to be free, without any anxiety for the future.

In this town the usual way of getting about was by bicycle. So I bought one in order to go wherever I wanted without difficulty, and since both the town and the surrounding countryside were quite flat, one could cover long distances without effort. The machine had two strong carriers, one in front and the other behind: so like many of the locals I could easily take two people with me.

At least twice a week I went out for an hour or two with my friends the Indian girls. They were absolutely delighted, and I began to see that one of them, the younger girl, was beginning to fall in love with me.

I'd never seen her father, but the other day he appeared. He lived not far from our place, but he'd never come to see us and I only knew her brothers. He was a tall old man with a very long snow-white beard. His hair was silvery, too, and it parted to show a noble and intelligent forehead. He only spoke his Hindu language, and his daughter translated. He invited me to come and see him at his house. Through the little princess (that was my name for his daughter) he said it was no distance by bicycle. I promised to return his call before long.

When he'd eaten a few cakes and drunk some tea he went away, but I noticed that first he inspected the house in all its details. The little princess was delighted to see that her father was pleased with his visit and with us.

I was thirty-six and I was in perfect health; I still felt young and fortunately everybody looked upon me as young too - all my friends said I didn't look more than thirty. Now this girl was nineteen, and she had all the calm, placid beauty of her race as well as all its fatalism in her attitude to life. To know to be loved by such a wonderful girl would be a gift from heaven.

When the three of us went out she always got on the carrier in front, and she knew very well that when she was straight and I leant forward to pedal harder, my eyes were close to hers. If she held her head back I saw the beauty of her bare bosom under her veil. She was never worn nothing at all. Her great black r touched, and her mouth — dark red against her tea-coloured skin — opened just a little in her longing to be kissed. A mouth adorned with beautiful, perfect teeth. She had a way of saying certain words and of showing the tip of her pink tongue in her half-opened mouth that would have inflamed the holiest of the holy saints who have bequeathed the Catholic religion to us.

We were to go to the cinema one evening, just the two of us, because it seemed her sister had a headache — one of those headaches invented to leave us to ourselves, in my opinion. She appeared in a white muslin dress that came down to her ankles; there were three silver rings round them which showed as she walked. She was wearing sandals whose thongs went round her big toe: this made her feet seem very elegant. There was a very small gold shell in her right nostril. On her head, held by a golden ribbon, a short muslin veil came a little lower than her shoulders. Hanging from this ribbon there were three strings of many-coloured stones, reaching to the middle of her forehead. It was a charming piece of nonsense, of course; and when her head swayed it showed the striking blue spot tattooed on her forehead.

The whole Indian household and mine, in the persons of Cuic and Van Hue, watched us leave: they looked charmed at seeing our open happiness. They all looked as though they knew we'd come back from the cinema engaged.

We rode along towards the middle of the town, with her well settled on the cushion of my carrier. It was during a long stretch of free-wheeling down an ill-lit avenue that this magnificent girl, of her own accord, brushed my mouth with a light and fleeting kiss. I had had so little idea that she would take the first step that I nearly fell off the bicycle.

We sat at the back of the cinema, holding hands: I spoke to her with my fingers and she replied. We didn't watch the film; and our first loving exchanges, sitting there in that cinema, were completely silent. There was a singing in her fingers, her long, carefully trimmed and varnished nails, and in the pressure of her palm; they told me much better than words about her love for me and her desire to be mine. She laid her head on my shoulder, and this allowed me to kiss her pure and lovely face.

This shy, timid love, so long in coming to flower, quickly developed into a whole-hearted passion. I'd told her, before she was mine, that I couldn't marry her, since I already had a wife in France. That hardly worried her for so long as a day. One night she stayed with me. She said that because of her brothers and certain Indian neighbours she would rather I went and lived with her at her father's place. I agreed and moved over to his house: he lived there alone with a young Indian woman, a distant relation, who looked after him and did all the housework. It was only about a quarter of a mile from the house where Cuic went on living. So my two friends came to see me every evening and spent an hour or so with me. Quite often they stayed to supper.

We still went on selling vegetables down by the harbor. We leave at half past six and my Indian girl nearly always came with me. We took a big thermos full of tea and a bag with jam and a pot of jam; we waited for Cuic and Hué so that we could all eat together. She was the one who produced breakfast and she was very particular about this rite of the first meal of the day, all four of us together. She brought everything that we needed in her bag - a very small lace-trimmed mat that she ceremoniously laid on the pavement, having swept the mat first with a little brush, and four china cups and saucers. And sitting there on the ground, we solemnly had our breakfast.

It amused me to drink tea sitting on the pavement as though we were in a room; but both she and Cuic thought it perfectly natural. They took no sort of notice of the peculiarity, for in their opinion they were behaving quite ordinarily. It gave her so much pleasure to pour out the tea for us and spread the marmalade on the toast that it would have wounded her if I had ironing.' I was puzzled, but I thought the old man wanted to see a friend some way off, so I agreed quite cheerfully.

He sat there on the front carrier and he pointed out the way without a word, because he only spoke his own language. It was a long way, and I had to ride for the best part of an hour. We came to a wealthy district by the sea - splendid villas everywhere. My 'father-in-law' made a sign: I stopped and watched him. He took a round white stone from under his robe and knelt at the bottom of the steps leading up to a house. He rolled the stone on the step and at the same time he chanted. A few minutes went by and then a woman dressed in Indian clothes came out of the house and gave him something without saying a word.

He went on from house to house, doing the same thing until four o'clock in the afternoon. It was a long business, and I could not make it out. At the last house it was a man dressed in white who came out. He made the old boy stand up and taking his arm he led him into the house. He stayed there more than a quarter of an hour and then came out again, still with the man in white, who kissed his forehead or rather his white hair before taking leave of him. We went home, and I pedalled as hard as I could to get there quickly, because by now it was half past four.

Fortunately we reached the house before nightfall. First my pretty Indara took her father to his room; then she hung round my neck, kissing me and pulling me along towards the bathroom so I could have a shower. There was cool, fresh linen waiting for me, and I sat down at the table, washed, shaved and changed. I was on fire with curiosity. Only I knew you must never try to force an Indian or a Chinese to tell you anything - there always has to be a certain waiting period. Then they'll tell you of their own accord, because they can sense you're asking for their trust; and if they think you worthy of it, they'll give it you. And that's what happened with Indara.

After we'd made love for a long while and she was lying, quite relaxed, with her still-hot cheek on my bare arm, she said, without looking at me, 'You know, sweetheart, when my father goes out to look for gold, he doesn't do any harm: far from it. He calls up spirits to protect the houses where he rolls his stone. They give him a piece of gold to say thank you. It's a very old custom in Java, where we come from.'

That was what my princess told me. But one day a friend of hers had a talk with me in the market. It so happened that neither Indara nor the Chinese had arrived yet. This pretty girl – she was from Java too – told me something quite different. 'Why on earth do you go on working, now you live with the sorcerer's daughter? Isn't she ashamed of making you get up so early, even when it rains? You could live without doing anything, what with all that gold her father earns. She can't love you, or she would never let you get up so early.'

'And what does her father do? Tell me about it – I don't know a thing.'

'Well, her father's a sorcerer from Java. If he likes, he can bring death on you or your family. The only way of escaping the spell he casts with his magic stone is to give him so much gold that he'll roll it the way opposite to the way he rolls it to bring death. When he does that he undoes all the curses – he brings health and life for you and everybody in your household.'

'That's not at all the way Indara told it.'

I decided to make a check to see which of them was right. Some days later I was with my white-bearded 'father-in-law' on the bank of a stream that ran through Penitence Rivers and joined the Demerara. The look on the Indian fishermen's faces told me all I wanted to know. Every one of them gave him a fish and hurried away from the water's edge as quickly as possible. It was quite clear. I no longer needed to ask anybody anything.

As far as I was concerned, my Indian father-in-law didn't worry me in the very least. He never spoke to me in anything but his own language, and he imagined I understood a little. I never could manage to make out what he meant. That had its good side – it was impossible for us to disagree. And then in spite of everything he did find me work to do: I tattooed their foreheads for the girls of between thirteen and fifteen. Sometimes he bared their bosoms and I tattooed their breasts. I leaves or coloured petals – green, pink and blue – and the tip rise like the pistil of a flower. The brave men (and they were a great deal) had the dark circle round their eyes painted bright yellow; and a few even had the tip of their noses painted double pleasure – that of admiring the Javanese girls' lovely bosoms and that of making money.

He put up a notice in front of the house that said 'Tattoo artist – work guaranteed'. The tattooing was well done.

Cuic found a restaurant for sale down by the harbour. He proudly brought me the news and suggested we should buy the place. The price was right: eight hundred dollars. By selling the sorcerer's gold and adding our savings, we could buy the restaurant. I went to have a look at it. It was in a little street, but it was very close to the harbour, and the district was crowded at all hours of the day and night. There was one fairly big black-and-white tiled room, eight tables on the left, eight on the right, and in the middle a round table where you could show the hors d'oeuvres and the fruit. A big, airy, well lit kitchen: two large ovens and two huge ranges.

Restaurant and Butterflies

We bought the place. Indara herself sold all our gold. Her father was surprised I'd never touched the scraps he'd given his daughter for us both. He said, 'I gave them to you so you could make use of them. They belong to you two – you don't have to ask me if you want to sell them. Do whatever you please.'

My sorcerer father-in-law wasn't such a bad old stick. As for Indara, she was in a class apart as a mistress, as a wife and as a friend. There was no danger of our quarrelling, because she always answered yes to everything I said. The only time she looked a trifle sour was when I tattooed the other girls' tits.

So here I was, the owner of the Victory Restaurant in Water Street, in the heart of Georgetown's harbour district. Cuic was to do the cooking: he liked it and it was his trade. Hue was to look after the buying and to make the chow mein. This was how it was made: best wheat flour was mixed with a great many yolks of eggs and then beaten. The dough was worked other way about. The snag is sticking them on without its showing.'

After a good many attempts that didn't work, we managed to fix two male wings to a splendid female without its showing: we did this by making a tiny cut in her thorax and glueing the ends of the wings with diluted balata. It held so well you could pick the butterfly up by the phony wings. I put it into a glass case with others belonging to an ordinary twenty-dollar collection, as if I'd not noticed it. The bait took. The American had hardly caught sight of it before he had the nerve to walk in with a twenty-dollar bill in his hand, wanting to buy the collection. I told him it was reserved - a Swede had asked me for a case and this one was for him. During the next couple of days the American had the box in his hands at least a score of times. At last he couldn't bear it any longer and he said to me, 'I'll buy the butterfly in the middle for twenty dollars and you can keep the rest.'

'What's so unusual about the middle one?' I asked, and looked at it closely. Then I exclaimed, 'My God, it's a hermaphrodite!'

'Eh? Why, yes: so it is. I hadn't been quite sure,' said the Yank. 'With the glass you can't see very well. Do you mind if I take it off?' He stared at the butterfly from every angle. 'What do you want for it?'

'Didn't you tell me one day that a specimen like that was worth five hundred dollars?'

'I've told several butterfly-hunters the same thing: I don't want to profit by the ignorance of the man who caught this one.'

'Then it's five hundred dollars or nothing.'

'It's a deal. Keep it for me. Look, here's all I have on me to show it's a sale - sixty dollars. Give me a receipt and tomorrow I'll bring the rest. And whatever you do, take it out of this box.'

'OK. I'll keep it somewhere else. Here's your receipt.'

As we opened the descendant of Lincoln appeared. He examined the butterfly again, this time with a little magnifying-glass. My heart was in my mouth when he turned it upside down. He was satisfied: he paid me, put the butterfly in a box he'd brought himself, asked me for another receipt and went away.

Two months later the cops picked me up when - freckled lump of a red-head wasn't satisfied with just the sight of a naked thigh. When the panties put in their fleeting appearance his hand darted out and his brutish fingers gripped my Javanese like a vice. As she happened to have a full water jug in her hand it didn't take her a second to smash it on his head. The sailor went down under the blow, tearing off her panties as he fell. I rushed to pick him up, but his friends thought I was going to hit him, and before I could utter one of them had hit me right in the eye. Did the sea-going boxer really mean to stand up for his shipmate, or did he just want to give the husband a black eye – the husband who prevented him from getting at the pretty Indian girl? Who knows? At all events, my eye copped it good and hard. But he was altogether too sure of winning, for he stood there in front of me with his fists up calling out, 'Box, man box!' A kick in the balls followed by my own particular kind of butt laid the boxer flat.

Now the fight spread. Van Hue came to my help from the kitchen and laid about him with his chow mein stick. Cuic darted in with a long two-pronged fork and jabbed right and left. A Parisian tough, a former pillar of the rue de Lappe dance halls, used a chair by way of a club. No doubt feeling handicapped by the loss of her panties, Indara withdrew from the battle.

The final count was five Yanks with bad head wounds and others with double holes in various parts of their bodies, made by Cuic's fork. Blood everywhere. A gleaming black Negro policeman had posted himself at the door so that no one could get out. And it was lucky that he had, because an American military police jeep turned up. With their clubs raised, the white gaiters tried to force their way in; and since they'd seen their own sailors all covered with blood it was certainly their intention to revenge them. The black policeman shoved them back and put his arm and his truncheon across the door, saying, 'His Majesty's police.'

It was only when the English police arrived that we were brought out and put into the black maria. We were taken to the police station. Apart from my black eye, none of us was hurt, which meant that they did not have much faith in our plea of self-defence. At the trial, a week later, the judge accepted our statement and let us all go except for Cuic, who got three months for assault and battery. He had handed out a very great many of his two-pronged stabs, and it was difficult to explain them away.

After that there were six more fights in under a fortnight, and we felt we couldn't go on. The sailors had determined not to call it a day, and as the newcomers always had different faces, how could we tell who were our friends and who were our enemies?

So we sold the restaurant, not even getting the price we'd paid for it. It was true that with the reputation it had acquired, the buyers didn't stand in line for it.

'What are we going to do, Hue?'

'Until Cuic comes out, let's rest. We can't take to the donkey and cart again, because they were sold together with the stock and the goodwill. The best thing is to do nothing – just rest. Then later we'll see.'

Cuic came out. He told us he'd been well treated. 'The only thing,' he said, 'is that I was near two men who'd been condemned to death.' The English have a disgusting way of giving a man with a death sentence forty-five days' notice that he's going to be hanged high and dry on such-and-such a day and at such-and-such an hour and that the Queen's reprieve has been refused. 'So,' said Cuic, 'every morning the two men who were to be topped called out to one another, "One day less, Johnny: only so many days now!" And then the other would go on shouting insults at his accomplice for hours on end.' Apart from that Cuic had had an easy time, and they had thought highly of him.

The Bamboo Hut

Pascal Fosco came down from the bauxite mines. He was one of the men who'd tried to hold up the Marseilles post-office. His accomplice had been guillotined. Pascal was the toughest of us all. He was a clever mechanic, but he only made four dollars a day: even so, he always managed to keep one or two of the other convicts who were having a bad time.

This bauxite mine was deep in the bush. A little village had grown up round the camp, and the miners and engineers lived there. There was a continual stream of aluminium-ore coming down to the port to be loaded into the many ships. An idea came into my head: why shouldn't we start a joint in that village at the back of beyond? At night the men must be bored black - bored through the ground.

'That's quite true,' said Fosco. 'It's not a bleeding fun-fair. There's absolutely nothing.'

A little later Indara, Cuic, Van Hue and I were aboard a tub steaming up the river: in two days' time we reached the MacKenzie mine. The engineers, overseers and skilled craftsmen had a camp made up of comfortable little houses, all provided with metal screens against the mosquitoes. But the village was revolting. Nothing built of brick, stone or concrete. Nothing but mud-and-bamboo huts with palm-frond roofs or, on the more modern ones, sheets of corrugated iron. There were four horrible overcrowded restaurants with bars. The miners had to fight to get a glass of warm beer. Not a single place had a refrigerator.

Pascal was right: there was business to be done in this remote backwater. After all, I was making a break, I was on the run - this was adventure - I couldn't live ordinarily, like my friends. Working just to make enough to live on didn't interest me at all.

As the streets were ankle-deep in mud every time it rained I picked on a higher place a little back from the middle of the village. That way I was sure that when it rained neither the inside nor the surroundings of the building I had in mind would be flooded.

In ten days, helped by the Negro carpenters who worked in the mine, we ran up a rectangular hall twenty yards long and eight wide. Thirty tables for four would mean that we could get a hundred and twenty customers in easily. A raised stage for the performance, a bar the width of the room and a dozen high stools. Next to this hall another building with eight bedrooms that would easily house sixteen people.

When I went down to Georgetown to buy the equipment, chairs, tables, etc., I took on four splendid black girls to wait on the customers. Daya, who used to work in the restaurant, decided to come with us. An Indian girl would thump the old piano I'd hired. All that remained for me to do was to fix the show.

After a great deal of trouble and soft soap I managed to persuade six girls, two of them Javanese, one Portuguese, one Chinese and two just brown, to give up whoring and become strip-tease artistes. I bought an old red curtain in a junk shop for the start and the finish of the show.

I went upstream with all my people, hiring a Chinese fisherman's bongo specially for the purpose. A spirit merchant had provided me with every conceivable kind of drink on credit. He trusted me, and every month I'd pay for what I'd sold, checking the inventory, while he would send up new supplies as they were needed. An old gramophone and some second-hand records would provide music when the pianist stopped tormenting the piano. I found an Indian who'd bought a theatrical touring company's wardrobe and I picked out all kinds of dresses, petticoats, black and coloured stockings, suspender belts and bra's: they were all still in very good condition, and I chose them for their violent colours.

Cuic bought the chairs, tables and bedding; Indara looked after the glasses and everything else needed for the bar; I bought the drinks and made all the arrangements for the show. We had to go at things very hard to get it all ready in a week. Still, we managed it, and the girls and the equipment filled the entire boat.

Two days later we reached the village. The appearance of ten girls in this dismal hole, deep in the bush, caused an uproar. Each carrying a bundle, we made our way up to the Bamboo Hut, which was the name we'd given our joint. The rehearsals began. Teaching my artistes to strip was not at all an easy job. In the first place because I spoke English very badly, so that no one understood what I said; and in the second all their lives they'd whipped off their clothes so as to have a quicker turnover of customers. Whereas now it was quite the opposite – the slower, the sexier. There were different tactics for each girl. And her way of doing it also had to harmonize with her clothes.

There was the Marquise, in a pink corset and a crinoline, with long white lace drawers: she undressed slowly behind a screen but in front of a large mirror that allowed the audience to see every morsel of flesh as she gradually uncovered it. Then pleasure of the chick at his table for an hour, all at the cost of his bottle. It was brought to him like this: when the artiste was mother-naked behind her fan, we span the wheel, and when the number came up she got on to a big silver-painted wooden tray. Four men took hold of it and carried her to the winning table. She uncorked the champagne herself and had a drink, still stark naked; then she'd excuse herself and come back five minutes later and sit at the table, dressed again.

For six months everything went fine; but when the rainy season was over a new set of customers appeared. These were the gold and diamond prospectors, who wandered about all over the bush, searching its many alluvial deposits. It was a very, very tough life, this looking for gold and diamonds with rudimentary equipment. The diggers often killed or robbed one another, so everybody carried weapons. And when they had a little poke of gold-dust or a handful of diamonds they just couldn't withstand the temptation of flinging it about. The girls were given a high commission on each bottle. So obviously when they were entwined with the customers they would pour their champagne or whiskey into the ice-bucket so as to finish the bottle sooner. In spite of all they drank, some customers realized what was going on, and then their reactions were so violent that I was forced to have the chairs and tables screwed to the floor.

war-time restrictions, I began to grow tired of Georgetown. What's more, up till now my princess had never been jealous and I had been as free as a bird: but now she never let me move an inch without her, and she'd sit close to me for hours and hours, no matter where we were.

The possibilities of doing business in Georgetown grew fainter. So one fine day I was seized with a longing to leave British Guiana for some other country. There was no danger about it, because this was war-time. No country would hand us back; or at least that was what I thought.

Break from Georgetown

Guittou was of the same opinion. He too thought there must be countries where it would be easier to make a living than British Guiana. We began to prepare for a break. For indeed, leaving British Guiana was a very serious crime. There was a war on and we none of us had a passport.

Three months before this Chapar had escaped from Cayenne, having been un-interned. He was now making ices in a Chinese cake-shop for one dollar fifty a day. He wanted to quit Georgetown too. And there were two others who wanted to come – a lag from Dijon called Deplanque and another guy from Bordeaux. Cuic and Van Hue preferred to stay. They were quite happy here.

The mouth of the Demerara river was very carefully watched and guarded by nests of machine-guns, torpedo-tubes and heavy artillery, so we decided to make an exact copy of a fishing-boat registered at Georgetown and sail out, passing ourselves off as the same vessel. I blamed myself for being ungrateful to Indara and for not returning her total devotion as I ought. But there was nothing I could do about it: she clung to me so these days that it got on my nerves – she angered me. There are plain, uncomplicated beings who don't hold back their desires in any way and they don't wait for their lovers to take the first step. This Indian girl behaved ex-

The young man held out his arms and called her: her movements showed that she couldn't tell what to do. Her mother had borne her: her gestures made one see the birth. Then her mother had suckled her. Could she forget all that to follow the man she loved? Maybe: but don't be in such a hurry, said her hands; just wait a moment and let me gaze a little longer at these dear parents of mine who, until I met you, were all I had to live for.

Then his gestures showed that life required that she too should be a wife and a mother. And all this went on to the sound of the girls' chanting and the answering song of the boys. Finally, having once more escaped from her husband's embrace and having kissed her parents, she ran a few steps and leapt into his arms. He hurried her off and took her away in the little flower-covered cart that was waiting for them.

We prepared the break with scrupulous care. We got a long, broad boat ready, with a good mainsail and jib and a first-class rudder, taking care the police shouldn't see what we were doing. We hid it downstream from our district in Penitence River, a tributary of the Demerara. It had exactly the same paintwork and number as a Chinese fishing boat registered in Georgetown. If a searchlight picked it out, only the crew would look different. To make the deception perfect we'd have to squat, because the Chinese in the boat we were copying were wizened little characters, whereas we were all big men.

It all went without a hitch and we ran out of the Demerara river in triumph, getting right out to sea. But in spite of the pleasure of having got away and of having avoided the danger of being discovered, I couldn't savour it to the full: there was just one thing that rather spoilt it for me, and that was having stolen off without a word to my Indian princess. I was not pleased with myself. She, her father and all her people had done me nothing but good and I was making a run away. I didn't try and find reasons to justify my behaviour. thighs were all in the same state: completely raw. We were so tortured by thirst that Deplanque and Chapar went so far as to drink salt water. After that they suffered even worse. In spite of our thirst and our gnawing hunger, there was one good thing – no one, absolutely no one, complained. No one handed out any advice, either. If anyone chose to drink salt water or throw it over himself, saying it cooled him, he could do so and find out all by himself that it bit into his wounds and made him even hotter when it evaporated.

I was the only one to have a completely open, healthy eye; all the others were suppurating and constantly gumming up. This meant they had to bathe their eyes however much it hurt, because they had to be able to open their eyes and see properly. The furious sun beat down on our sores with such force that we could hardly bear it. Deplanque was half out of his mind, and he kept on talking about throwing himself into the sea.

For the last hour it had seemed to me that I could make out land on the horizon. Of course I steered for it straight away, but without saying anything, because I was not sure. Birds appeared and flew around us: so I hadn't been mistaken. Their cries roused my companions, who were lying in the bottom of the boat, stupefied by the sun and their weariness – they lay there shielding their faces with their arms.

Guittou rinsed his mouth so as to be able to speak and said, 'Do you see the land, Papi?'

'Yes.'

'How long do you think it'll take us to get there?'

'Between five and seven hours. Listen, brothers: I'm all in. I've got the same sunburn as you, and on top of that my buttocks are raw with the rubbing of the wood and the salt water. There's not much wind, and we're only going along slowly: the muscles of my arms are cramping all the time and so are my hands, worn out with gripping this paddle I use as a rudder. Will you agree to what I say, now? Let's lower the sail and spread it over the boat like an awning to shelter us from this bloody sun until night falls. The boat'll drift towards the land all by itself. That's what we must do unless one of you will take my place steering.'

'No, no, Papi. Let's do what you say, and all of us except one sleep in the shadow of the sail.'

The sun was just beyond its height when I put this decision on the roads in wicked conditions and then they were handed back to France.'

'Yes, but it's not the same now. There's a war on.'

'According to what I heard in Georgetown, they're not at war. They're neutral.'

'Are you sure of that?'

'Dead sure.'

'Well, in that case it would be dangerous for us.'

We could see the lights on land both to the right and to the left. The siren again, and this time it gave three quick howls. Lights flashed at us from the right-hand shore. The moon had just risen, far ahead of us, but on our path. Right in front of us two huge pointed black rocks soared up from the water. So that must be what the siren was for – it was warning us that the place was dangerous.

'Why, look! Buoys. A whole string of them. Why don't we tie up and wait for daylight? Chapar, lower the sail.'

Straight away he let go the collection of trousers and shirts that I so pompously called the sail. I braked with my paddle and brought the boat's bows to one of these 'buoys'. Fortunately there was a fair length of rope so well tied to the mooring ring that the cyclone had not been able to rip it off. There we were, made fast. Not moored directly to this strange looking buoy, because there was nothing on its surface to get a hold on, but to the cable that linked it to another a little farther on. They were no doubt there to mark a channel, and so there we rode; firmly moored to the cable. Without bothering about the howling that still kept on coming from the shore to our right we all lay down in the bottom of the boat, sheltering ourselves from the wind with the sail. I had been chilled through and through by the breeze and the night air, but now a gentle warmth flooded over me and I was certainly one of the first to go fast asleep.

The day was clear and bright when I woke up. The sun was rising: there was quite a sea running, and the blue-green of the water showed that the bottom was coral.

'What are we going to do? Shall we make up our minds to go ashore? This hunger and thirst are killing me.'

This was the first time anyone had complained since the beginning of these days with nothing to eat – just seven of them now.

'We're so close in it'd be no great crime,' said Chapar

Sitting there in the stern and looking right ahead beyond the huge rocks that rose from the sea, I could plainly see the great cliff in the land, so it was Trinidad to our right and Venezuela to our left. There was no sort of doubt that we were in the Gulf of Paria, and the reason why the water was blue and not yellow from the current of the Orinoco was that we were lying in the channel of the current that passes between the two continents and then runs far out to sea.

'What are we going to do?' That's for all of you guys to say: it's too serious for just one man to take the decision. To the right, that's the English Island of Trinidad. To the left, Venezuela. Which do you want to go to? We might to get ashore as quickly as possible, our boat and ourselves in the state we are. There are two fine expert men here, Chittott and Barstie. The other three, Chapar, Deplanque and me, run a greater risk. It's for us to decide. What do you people say?'

'The wisest thing is to go to Trinidad, Venezuela - we know nothing about it.'

'There's no need to make any decision,' said Deplanque. 'This bunch that's coming will make it for us.'

And there in fact was a bunch, coming fast in our direction. Here it was: it stopped fifty yards away. A man was picking up a hand-buffet. I caught sight of a flag - not an English flag. It was a flag I'd never seen before, a very beautiful flag all covered with stars. It must be Venezuelan. Later it was to be 'my flag', the standard of my new country and the most moving of all symbols for me - a symbol that meant that I, like every other ordinary man, had concentrated all the noblest qualities of a great nation, of my nation, into a scrap of cloth.

'Quien son vosotros? (Who are you?)'

'We're French.'

'Estan locos? (Are you mad?)'

'Why?'

'Porque son muchos a millos (Because you are tied up in a million).'

'Is that why you don't come any closer?'

'Yes. Cast off right away.'

'OK.'

Chapar had undone the rope in three seconds. We'd been moved to a string of floating mines. We went alongside the launch, and its captain told us that it was a mine-field we had not been blown up. They didn't come aboard, but handed us coffee, hot milk with plenty of sugar in it, and some cigarettes.

'Go to Venezuela. You'll be well treated, I promise you. We can't tow you in because we're on our way to pick up a badly wounded man on the Barimas lighthouse – it's urgent. Whatever you do don't try to run for Trinidad, because it's ten to one you'll hit a mine. And then . . .'

Calling out 'Adios, buena suerte (Good-bye, good luck)' the launch went off. They left us two bottles of milk. We hoisted the sail. It was ten in the morning, my stomach was beginning to return to normal, thanks to the coffee and hot milk, and I had a cigarette in my mouth when I ran ashore, taking no sort of precautions and landing on the soft sand of a beach with some fifty people on it – they had all come down to watch the arrival of this strange craft with its stump of a mast and a sail made of jackets, trousers and shirts.

Thirteenth Exercise-Book Venezuela

The Fishermen of Irapa

I discovered a world, a people, and a civilization that were entirely unknown to me. Those first moments on Venezuelan soil were so moving that it would need more than my small amount of talent to explain, express and describe the atmosphere – the welcome these warm, open-handed people gave us. Some of the men were black, others white; but the great majority were a very light colour – that of a European after several days in the sun: and they almost all had their trousers rolled up to the knees.

‘Poor fellows, what a state you’re in!’ they said.

The fishing village where we’d landed was called Irapa, and administratively it belonged to the state of Sucre. All the women without exception turned themselves into nurses, nuns and guardian angels. The young ones (every one of them pretty – rather small, but Lord how graceful), the middle-aged and the really old. They took us all to a house where they had hung five woollen hammocks and set out a table and chairs in the lean-to, and there they rubbed us from head to foot with cocoa butter. Not an inch of raw flesh was overlooked. We were dying of hunger and exhaustion and our long fast had brought on a fair degree of dehydration: these fishing people knew very well that we should sleep but that we should also eat small quantities at a time.

We each of us lay at our ease in a hammock, and even while we were sleeping, we were given little spoonfuls of food by our amateur nurses. My strength completely deserted me the moment they laid me in my hammock with my naked sores covered with the cocoa butter, and I collapsed entirely, sleeping, eating and drinking without really knowing what was going on around me.

My empty stomach would not hold the first spoonfuls of their kind of tapioca. I wasn’t the only one, either. We all of us threw up at least some of the food these kind women put into our mouths, and we did so several times.

The people of this village were exceedingly poor, but there was not a single one of them that did not help us. In three days' time, thanks to the care they took and to our youth we were almost on our feet again. We got up for hours on end, and sitting there under the cool shade of the palm fronds of the lean-to my friends and I talked to the people of Irapa. They were not wealthy enough to dress us all in one go, so they formed little groups, one looking after Guittou, another after Deplanque, etc. There were nearly a dozen who took care of me. The first days they dressed us in any old clothes that came to hand – old, but scrupulously clean. Now every time they could they bought us a new shirt, a pair of trousers, a belt, a pair of shoes. Among the women who looked after me there were two very young girls: they looked mostly Indian, but there must already have been a mixture of Spanish or Portuguese blood. One was called Tibisay and the other Nenita. They bought me a shirt, a pair of trousers and a pair of the shoes they called aspargatas. They had heelless leather soles and their uppers were made of plaited cloth. The cloth only covered the instep and heel – it left the toes free.

'There's no need to ask where you come from. We can see from your tattooings that you escaped from the French penal settlement.'

That moved me even more deeply. What! Knowing that we were men condemned for serious crimes, men who had escaped from a prison whose harshness they knew from magazines and newspapers, these humble people thought it quite natural to take us in and help us? It is already a striking proof of goodness when a fairly well-to-do or wealthy man gives another clothes, or when, from his copious store, he gives food to hungry strangers. But there is something truly wonderful about cutting a home-baked cassava or maize loaf in two when it's insufficient for you and your own family; sharing a meal – that was not enough in the first place – with a stranger, a fugitive from justice into the bargain.

This morning everybody was very quiet, both men and women too. They seemed concerned and worried. What was up? Tibisay and Nenita were with me. I'd managed to shave for the first time for a fortnight, for now it was a week since we'd been with these great-hearted people. A thin film of skin had formed over my burns, so I was able to use a razor. Because of my beard, these girls had only had a vague notion of my age. They were absolutely delighted to find that I was young, and they naively told me so. Yet I was thirty-five, although I only looked twenty-eight or thirty. Yes, I could certainly feel that all these hospitable men and women were worried for us.

'What can be happening? Tell me, Tibisay, what's the matter?'

'We're expecting the authorities from Guiria, a village near Irapa. There's no administrator here, and the police know about your being with us, though we can't tell how. Anyway they're going to come.'

A tall and lovely black girl came to see me, bringing with her a splendidly-proportioned young man, bare to the waist and with his trousers rolled up to his knees. In Venezuela they often call coloured women La Negrita as a pet name – there is no kind of religious or racial discrimination about it whatsoever. So La Negrita said to me, 'Señor Enrique [Monsieur Henri], the police are coming. I don't know whether they're going to do you harm or not. Would you like us to hide you in the mountains for a while? My brother could take you to a hut where no one would ever find you. Tibisay, Nenita and me, between us we would bring you food every day and tell you what was going on.'

I was very deeply touched and I tried to kiss the noble girl's hand, but she pulled it away, and very sweetly and chastely kissed me on the cheek.

A party of horsemen arrived at a gallop. They all had machetes, the long knives used for cutting sugar cane, hanging like swords at their left sides; and they all had a broad, full cartridge-belt with a huge revolver in a holster. They dismounted. A tall, lean man with a Mongolian-looking face, the slit eyes of an Indian and a copper-coloured skin – a man of about forty – came towards us. He was wearing an enormous rice-straw hat.

'Good morning. I am the administrator.'

'Good morning, señor.'

'You people, why didn't you tell us you had five escaped French prisoners here? I'm told they've been in Irapa a week. Answer me.'

'We were waiting for them to be able to walk and for their burns to heal.'

'We've come to fetch them and take them to Guiria. A lorry is on its way.'

'Coffee?'

'Yes, please.'

We sat there in a circle and everybody had some coffee. I considered the administrator and his men. They did not seem wicked. I had the impression that they were obeying orders from above without necessarily agreeing with them.

'Have you escaped from Devil's Island?'

'No, we come from Georgetown, in British Guiana.'

'Why didn't you stay there?'

'It's hard to earn a living in those parts.'

He smiled and said, 'You think you'll be better off here than with the English?'

'Yes, because we're Latins, like you.'

A group of seven or eight men came towards our circle. They were led by a white-haired man of about fifty with very light chocolate-coloured skin. He was five foot eight, and his huge black eyes showed remarkable intelligence and strength of mind. His right hand rested on the hilt of a machete hanging at his side.

'Chief, what are you going to do with these men?'

'I'm going to take them to the prison at Guiria.'

'Why don't you let them stay with us, living with our families? Each will take one.'

'It's impossible - I have orders from the governor.'

'But they've committed no crime on Venezuelan soil.'

'I agree. But still, these are very dangerous men; because to be sent to the French penal settlements they must have been guilty of really serious crimes. What's more, they've escaped without any papers, and their country will certainly ask for them back when it's known they're in Venezuela.'

'We want to keep them with us.'

'Impossible - governor's orders.'

'Everything's possible. What does the governor know about truly unfortunate people? A man is never lost. Whatever he may have done, there's always some moment in his life when he has a chance of retrieving himself and becoming a good and useful member of the community. Isn't that right, all of you?'

'Yes,' said all the men and women with one voice. 'Leave them with us and we'll help them make a new life for them.'

At last, five or six hundred miles from the sea, we reached our journey's end: it was where the earth road through the virgin forest from Ciudad Bolivar to El Dorado came to a halt. Both guards and prisoners, we were utterly exhausted by the time we reached the village.

Let me tell you about this El Dorado. To begin with it was the great hope of the Spanish conquistadores who saw that the Indians from those parts possessed gold and who firmly believed that there was a mountain of gold there: or if not entirely of gold then at least half gold and half earth. Now El Dorado is a village on the bank of a river full of caribes, of piranhas, those carnivorous fish that can entirely devour a man or an animal in a few minutes, and of tembladores - electric eels that instantly knock out their victim with an electric shock and then later suck his rotting carcass. In the middle of the river there is an island, and on the island there was a real genuine concentration camp. This was the Venezuelan penal settlement.

This hard-labour colony was the roughest thing I'd ever seen in my life: and it was the most savagely inhuman, too, because of the way the men were knocked about. It formed a square, each side being a hundred and fifty yards long, and it was surrounded by barbed wire. There were close on four hundred men who slept there in the open air, because there were only a few zinc-roofed shelters scattered here and there about the camp.

We were not asked for any explanation and we were given none: we were clapped into this prison of El Dorado the moment we arrived in the lorry at three in the afternoon, exhausted and in chains. They didn't trouble to write down our names or even ask them; but at half past three we were called out - two of us were given shovels and the other three picks. Five soldiers surrounded us: they carried rifles and bull's pizzlies and they were commanded by a corporal. Under the threat of being beaten we were forced to march to a place where men were working. We grasped straight away that the prison guards were putting on a demonstration of strength and that it would be extremely dangerous to disobey for the moment. We'd see about it later.

When we got to the place where the men were working they made us dig a trench along the side of a road they were driving through the virgin forest. We set to without a word and each one of us worked steadily, as far as his strength would allow. This didn't prevent us from hearing the insults and the savage blows that rained down on the prisoners without a pause. Not one of us was beaten. The object of putting us to work like this the moment we arrived was above all to let us see how prisoners were treated here.

It was a Saturday. Sweating and dusty, we were taken into the camp when our work was over, but still without any formalities of any kind.

'The five Frenchmen, over here!' It was the presso corporal speaking – the provost. He was a six-foot half-caste and he carried a bull's pizzle in his hand. This foul brute was in charge of discipline, but only inside the camp. We were shown where to sling our hammocks: it was in the open air, near the gate. But at least there were some sheets of corrugated iron, which meant that we would be sheltered from the sun and the rain.

The great majority of the prisoners were Colombians: the rest Venezuelans. None of the punishment camps in our penal settlement could compare with this labour-colony for brutality. The treatment these men underwent would have killed a mule. Yet nearly all of them were remarkably well, because there was one thing about the place – there was an extraordinary amount of food and it was very good.

We held a little council of war. If any one of us was hit by a soldier, the best thing for us was to lie flat on the ground and not get up whatever they did to us. It would certainly reach the ears of an officer and then we could ask him how we came to be in this hard-labour prison without having committed any crime. The two time-expired men, Guittou and Barrière, spoke about asking to be handed back to France. Then we decided to call the presso corporal. I was the one who was to speak to him. They called him Negro Blanco [the White Negro]. Guittou went and fetched him. The brute appeared, still carrying his bull's pizzle. The five of us surrounded him.

'What do you want with me?'

I spoke. 'We want to tell you just one thing. We'll never disobey any of the rules here, so there'll be no reason for you to hit us. But we've noticed that you lash out quite unprovoked, hitting whoever happens to be within your reach. That's why we asked you to come here for us to tell you that the day you hit any one of us, you're a dead man. Do you get my meaning?'

'Yes,' said Negro Blanco.

'One last piece of advice.'

'What?' he said in a toneless voice.

'If what I've just said has to be repeated, let it be to an officer, not to a soldier.'

'OK.' And he went off.

All this happened on a Sunday, the day the prisoners didn't go to work. An officer appeared. 'What's your name?'

'Papillon.'

'You're the leader of the Frenchmen?'

'There are five of us and we're all leaders.'

'Why was it you that acted as spokesman with the provost?'

'Because I speak Spanish best.'

The man who was talking to me was a captain in the National Guard. He told me that he was not the commanding officer - there were two others above him, but they weren't there. He'd been in command since our arrival. The other two would come back on Tuesday. 'Speaking in your own name and in the name of your friends you have threatened to kill the provost if he hits any one of you. Is that true?'

'Yes, and it is a very serious threat. But I also said we'd do nothing that would in any way justify corporal punishment. As you know, Captain, no court has sentenced us, because we've committed no crime in Venezuela.'

'I know nothing about it. You reached the camp with no papers at all, only a note from the chief who's in the village, saying "Put these men to work as soon as they arrive."'

'Well, Captain, since you're a soldier, be fair enough to have your men told not to treat us like other prisoners, until your chiefs get here. Once again I assure you we've not been condemned and it's impossible that we should be, because we've committed no crime of any sort in Venezuela.'

'All right: I'll give orders accordingly. I hope you haven't lied to me.'

I had plenty of time that Sunday afternoon to study the other prisoners. The first thing that struck me was that physically they were all in good shape. Secondly, that blows were such an everyday matter, were handed out so freely, that they'd grown used to them - so much so that even on Sunday, the day of rest, when they could easily have avoided them by behaving properly, they seemed to take a masochistic pleasure in playing with fire. They never stopped doing things that were forbidden – playing craps, stuffing a boy in the latrines, stealing from other prisoners, calling out obscene words to the women who came from the village bringing sweets or cigarettes for the prisoners. They also traded things – a plaited basket or a carving for a few coins or packets of cigarettes. Well, there were some prisoners who managed to grab what the woman was offering through the barbed wire, run off without giving anything in exchange and hide among the other men. It all amounted to this: corporal punishment was dealt out so unjustly and so capriciously that the prisoners were thoroughly hardened to it; the reign of terror in the camp neither benefited society nor kept order – it had no sort of good effect whatsoever upon the unfortunate prisoners.

With its silence, the solitary confinement prison of Saint-Joseph was far more dreadful than this. Here the fear only lasted a matter of moments, and what with being able to talk at night, on Sundays and at times when there was no work, and with the great quantities of good food, a man could very well manage his sentence, which never exceeded five years in any case.

We spent Sunday smoking and drinking coffee, talking among ourselves. A few Colombians came over to us; we kindly but firmly sent them about their business. We had to be looked upon as prisoners of a different kind: otherwise we should be done for.

At six o'clock on Monday morning, after a hearty breakfast, we marched out to work with the others. This was how the job was set in hand: two lines of men opposite one another – fifty prisoners, fifty soldiers. One soldier to each prisoner. Between the two ranks, fifty tools: picks, shovels or axes. The two lines watched one another. The line of prisoners all on edge; the line of soldiers eager and sadistic.

A sergeant bawled out, 'So-and-So, pick!'

The poor bastard rushed forward and the moment he caught it up, put it on his shoulder and raced off towards his work, the sergeant shouted, 'Private number so-and-so!' The soldier tore along after the wretched prisoner, flogging him with his bull's pizzle. This horrible spectacle was repeated twice a day. Anyone would have thought that the place between the camp and the working site was filled with donkey drivers beating their animals along at full speed. As we waited for our turn we were rigid with apprehension. Fortunately it was different for us. 'You five Frenchmen, come here! The young ones take these pick-axes and the older ones these two shovels.'

We did not run to the working site, but we walked there very briskly, escorted by four soldiers and a corporal. This day was longer and more sickening than the first. There were some men who were specially picked upon, and when they were completely exhausted they flung themselves down on their knees howling like madmen and begging not to be hit any more. In the afternoon the men had to make one big pile from several heaps of logs that had not burnt away properly. Others had to clean up behind them. And then again, there were between eighty and a hundred half burnt faggots that had to be converted into one huge blaze in the middle of the camp. Each soldier flogged his prisoner as he picked up the wood and ran to the camp with it. During this hellish race some of them went absolutely out of their senses, and in their hurry they took hold of branches by the glowing end. This hideous scene lasted three hours, as they went barefoot over the embers, burning their hands and suffering under the rain of blows. None of us was asked to join in the cleaning up of this fresh clearing. It was just as well, because as we worked we had agreed – keeping our heads well down and using few words – each to tackle a soldier, including the corporal, take their rifles and fire right into the middle of all these brutes.

On Tuesday we didn't go to work. We were summoned to the office of the two National Guard majors. They were perfectly amazed at the fact of our being in El Dorado without any papers to show that some court had sent us there. They promised that at all events they would ask the governor of the settlement for an explanation.

It didn't take long. These two majors in command of the prison guard were certainly very strict – indeed they might be said to carry repression much too far – but they behaved correctly and they made the governor himself come to make things clear to us.

Here he was before us, with his brother-in-law, Russian, and the two National Guard officers.

'Frenchmen, I am the governor of the settlement of El Dorado. You have asked to speak to me. What is it that you want?'

'In the first place, what court has condemned us to serve a sentence in this hard-labour colony – condemned us unheard?'

you what must be done tomorrow.' And the Governor withdrew, together with his brother-in-law.

I thanked the officers. They gave us some cigarettes and promised to add a piece in the evening orders that would tell the officers and soldiers that on no account were we to be struck.

We'd been here a week now. We no longer went out to work. Yesterday – that is to say Sunday – something terrible happened. The Colombians drew lots to find who would kill the provost Negro Blanco. It was a man of about thirty who lost. They gave him an iron spoon whose handle had been sharpened on the cement and turned into a very pointed double-edged spearhead. The man kept his word bravely: he stabbed Negro Blanco three times near the heart. The provost was hurried off to hospital and the killer was tied to a stake in the middle of the camp. The soldiers ran about like madmen, searching for other weapons: They were in a furious rage, and as I didn't take my trousers off quickly enough, one of them fetched me a blow with his bull's pizzle on my thigh. Barrière caught up a bench and swung it over the soldier's head. Another soldier stabbed him through the arm with his bayonet just as I flattened my soldier with a kick in the guts. I'd already got his rifle when we heard a shouted order. 'Hold it, all of you! Don't touch the Frenchmen! Frenchie, drop that rifle!' It was Captain Flores, the one who had received us the first day.

He stepped in at the very moment I was about to fire into the general mass. If it hadn't been for him we might perhaps have killed one or two, but we should certainly have lost our lives, dying there stupidly in the Venezuelan forest at the back of beyond, in that penal settlement that had nothing to do with us nor we with it.

Thanks to the captain's forceful interference the soldiers left our group and went off to satisfy their appetite for butchery elsewhere. It was then that we witnessed the ugliest, basest sight a man can well imagine.

Tied to a stake in the middle of the camp, the Colombian was flogged and beaten continuously by three men at a time, soldiers and presso corporal included. This went on from five in the afternoon until the sun rose at six the next morning. How a man can last when it is only his body that is hit! There were very short pauses in the butchery during which he was asked who were his accomplices, who had given him the spoon and who had sharpened it. He betrayed no one, even when they promised they would stop the torture if he spoke. He lost consciousness several times. They brought him round by throwing buckets of water over him. It reached its climax at four in the morning. They saw that his skin was no longer reacting to the blows, not even by twitching, and they left off.

'Is he dead?' asked an officer.

'We don't know.'

'Untie him and set him on all fours.'

Four men propped him up, more or less on hands and knees. Then one of the torturers hit him with his whip so that the lash struck the division between his buttocks: the tip certainly went beyond his sexual organs. The master-stroke of torture at last forced out a shriek of agony.

'Go on,' said the officer. 'He's not dead.'

They went on beating him until daybreak. This mediaeval flogging would have killed a horse, but it did not finish off the Colombian. They left him alone for an hour and threw several buckets of water over him; at the end of this time he had the strength to get to his feet, helped by the soldiers. He even managed to stand upright by himself for a moment. The medical orderly appeared carrying a glass.

'Drink this purge,' ordered the officer. 'It'll pull you together.'

The Colombian hesitated, then drained the glass in one gulp. A moment later he fell to the ground, and this time for good. In his death agony he gasped out the words 'Fool. They've poisoned you.'

I need hardly say that none of the prisoners, nor any one of us, had the least intention of lifting a finger to help him. Every single man there was terrorized. This was the second time in my life I longed for death. A soldier a little way from me was holding his rifle carelessly, and for some minutes I was on the edge of grabbing it: the only thing that held me back was the idea that I might perhaps be killed before I had time to work the breech and fire into them.

A month later Negro Blanco was once more the terror of the camp – even more so this time. Yet it was written that he was fated to die at El Dorado. One night a soldier belonging to the guard pointed his rifle at him as the presso passed close by.

over with palm-fronds – one for Deplanque and me and the other for our two companions.

Toto and I made high stands with their feet in tins full of paraffin so that the ants should not eat the seeds, and very soon we had strong tomato plants, as well as aubergines, melons and haricot beans. We began planting them out in their beds, for now they were strong enough to withstand the ants. The little tomatoes had a kind of ditch or hollow round them that we often filled with water, to keep them moist all the time and to prevent the many parasites of this untouched ground from getting at them.

'Here, what's this?' said Toto. 'Look how this pebble sparkles.'

'Wash it, man.'

He passed it to me. It was a little crystal the size of a chick-pea. Once it was washed it shone even more on the side where it was broken from the mother-rock – it had been embedded in a sort of very hard stone.

'Could it be a diamond?'

'Shut up for Christ's sake, Toto. If it is one, this isn't the moment to bellow about it. Suppose we've been lucky enough to hit on a diamond mine? Hide it and let's wait until this evening.'

That evening I was giving a lesson in mathematics: my pupil was a corporal (now a colonel) who was then getting ready for his officer's examination. This man, unshakeably straight and great-hearted (he has proved it over a friendship of twenty-five years) is now called Colonel Francisco Bolagno Utrera.

'Francisco, what's this? Is it a piece of quartz?'

'No,' he said, having inspected it very thoroughly. 'It's a diamond. Hide it carefully and don't show it to anybody. Where did you find it?'

'Under my tomato seedlings.'

'That's odd. Maybe you carried it there when you brought water up from the river. Do you scrape the bottom with your bucket and so scoop up sand too?'

'Yes, sometimes.'

'Then that's the answer for sure. You carried your diamond up from the river, from the Caroni. Look very carefully to see whether you didn't bring up any others, because you never find just one gem stone. Where you find one, there have to be others.'

Toto set to work; he'd never worked like this in his life; he went at it so hard that our two companions, whom we hadn't told, said, 'Don't bash away like that, Toto. You'll kill yourself, carrying all this water up from the river. And you keep carrying up sand with it too.'

'That's just to make the earth lighter, mate,' said Toto. 'If you mix sand in, it drains better.'

We all made fun of him, but for all that Toto went on bringing up his buckets without a pause. At noon one day as the rest of us were sitting in the shade, he tripped and fell as he passed us. And out of the sand there rolled a diamond the size of two chick-peas. Once again, the mother-rock was broken, or else the stone would never have been seen. He made the mistake of grabbing it too fast.

'Why,' said Deplanque, 'isn't that a diamond? The soldiers say the river has diamonds in it, and gold, too.'

'That's why I carry all this water. Now you see that I'm not such a bloody fool after all,' said Toto. He was relieved that now at last he could say why he had been working so hard.

To cut the story of the diamonds short, in six months Toto had found between seven and eight carats; and I had about twelve, in addition to over thirty stones so small that they came into what the miners call the industrial category. But one day I found a single stone weighing more than six carats. When I had cut it at Caracas in later days it produced a diamond of very nearly four carats: I still have it, and I wear it on my finger day and night. Deplanque and Antartaglia also collected a certain number of stones. I still had my charger from prison and I kept mine in it. They made themselves something of the same kind out of the tips of horns, and that was where they kept their treasure.

No one knew a thing, apart from the future colonel, Corporal Francisco Bolagno. The tomatoes and the other plants grew: the officers scrupulously paid us for the vegetables that we took to their mess every day.

We had a fair amount of freedom. We worked without any guard and we slept in our two huts. We never went to the camp. We were left alone and quite well treated. Of course, every time we could we urged the governor to let us out. And every time he replied, 'Presently'. But now we'd been here eight months and nothing had happened. So I began to talk about making a break. Toto wouldn't have anything whatsoever to to with it. Nor would the others. I bought a hook and line so that I could study the river. I also took to selling fish, especially the well-known caribes, those carnivorous fish that weigh to a couple of pounds and that have teeth arranged like a 's - quite as dangerous, too.

There was a tremendous scene today. Gaston Duranton, known to his friends as Tordu, or Bent Gaston, had gone off on a break, carrying with him seventy thousand bolivars from the governor's safe.

This lag had a curious story of his own. When he was a child he was in the reformatory school on the Ile d'Oléron and he worked there in the bootmakers' shop. One day the leather and that held the shoe on his knee, going under his foot, broke and the jerk dislocated his hip. It was not looked after properly and it only went half way back into its socket; so all the rest of his life as a boy and part of his life as a man he was - lopsided. It was painful to see him walk - a thin, crooked boy who could only get along by dragging the leg that would not obey him. He came over to the penal settlement when he was twenty-five. After those long spells of reformatory school there was nothing surprising about his emerging as a thief.

Everyone called him Tordu. Almost nobody knew his real name of Gaston Duranton. Bent he was, Bent they called him. But although he was so lopsided he escaped from penal and got as far as Venezuela. Those were the days when Gomez was dictator. Not many men from penal survived his régime. There were a few exceptions, the most notable being Dr. Bougrat, because he saved the whole population of the pearl-fishing island of Margarita, where there was an epidemic of yellow fever.

Tordu was picked up by Gomez' special police, and sent to work on the Venezuelan roads. The French and Venezuelan prisoners were chained to iron balls that had the Toulon fleur de lys stamped on them. When the Frenchmen complained they were told, 'But all these chains, shackles and balls come from your own country! Just you have a look at the fleur de lys.' Well, Tordu escaped from the mobile camp when he was working on the road. They caught him a few days later and brought him back to this perambulating gaol. He was stretched out naked, flat on his belly, in front of all the prisoners, and he was sentenced to a hundred lashes.

He escaped again in 1943 and landed up in El Dorado. He told them he'd lived in Venezuela before, though he certainly didn't add that he'd done so as a prisoner, and straight away they gave him Chapar's job as a cook: for Chapar had turned gardener. So Tordu was over at the village, in the governor's house - that is to say, on the other side of the river.

In the governor's office there stood the colony's safe, with all the money in it. On this particular day, then, Tordu took these seventy thousand bolivars, which at that time were worth about twenty thousand dollars. Hence the turmoil in our garden - governor, governor's brother-in-law and the two guard majors milling frantically about. The governor wanted to put us back in the camp. The officers wouldn't have it. They stood up for us and at the same time for their supplies of vegetables. At last they managed to persuade the governor that we had no information to give him; that if we'd known anything, we'd have gone off with Tordu; and that our object was to be set free in Venezuela, not in British Guiana, which was the only place he could possibly go to.

Tordu was found dead nearly fifty miles away, in the bush very near the British Guiana frontier; and it was the vultures circling over him that gave him away. The first, most convenient, version of his death was that he had been murdered by the Indians. Much later a man was arrested in Ciudad Bolivar, changing brand-new five-hundred-bolivar notes. The bank that had sent the governor of El Dorado the notes had kept the numbers and they saw that these were the same - that these notes had been stolen. The man confessed and informed on two others, who were never arrested. That, then, was the life and death of my good friend Gaston Duranton, known by the name of Tordu.

Some of the officers secretly and illegally set prisoners to work, looking for gold and diamonds in the river. One of them found some - not in extraordinary quantities, but enough to make them very keen. Below my garden there was a stream working all day long with a wash-trough, a cone with a pump down; they filled it with earth and swilled it about - the pump being heavier than anything else would sink down in it. Very soon someone was killed: he had been killed by his boss. This little scandal put an end to the mining.

In the camp there was a man whose body was covered with a tattoo right arm was paralysed. His mouth was twisted and sometimes his big tongue hung out, drooling; so it was obvious he had had a stroke. Where? No one knew. He had been brought here before the rest of us. Where had he come from? The one thing that was certain was that he was an escaped lag or relégue. Bat d'As – the French army's penal battalion – was tattooed on his chest, and that together with the shit to the barber on his neck made it dead certain he was a convict.

The screws and the prisoners called him Picolino. He was well treated and they conscientiously gave him his food three times a day, and cigarettes. His blue eyes were intensely alive and they were by no means always sad. When he was looking at someone he liked they sparkled with pleasure. He understood everything that was said to him, but he could neither speak nor write – his paralysed right arm was incapable of holding a pen and his left hand lacked the thumb and two fingers. This wreck of a man leant up against the barbed wire for hours on end waiting for me to go by with the vegetables, because this was the path I took to go to the officers' mess. So every morning, as I carried up my stuff, I stopped to have a talk with Picolino. Leaning there on the barbed wire he would gaze at me with his fine blue eyes, so full of life in that almost dead body. I passed the time of day and then by nodding or winking he made me understand that he followed what I said. His poor paralysed face would light up for a moment and his eyes gleam as he tried to tell me God knows how many things. I always took him some little treat – tomatoes, lettuces or cucumbers made into a salad with a vinaigrette sauce, a little melon, or a fish cooked over the embers. He was never hungry, because the Venezuelan prison provided plenty of food; but it made a change from the official rations. And I always added a few cigarettes. This chat with Picolino became a settled habit, so much so that the soldiers and prisoners called him Picolino, son of Papillon.

Freedom

The Venezuelans were so pleasant, kindly and charming that an extraordinary thing happened: I made up my mind to put my faith in them. I would not make a break. I'd accept the wrongful situation of being a prisoner in the hope that some day I might belong to their nation. This may seem absurd. Their brutal way of treating the convicts was not calculated to make me feel like living among them; but on the other hand I came to realize that both prisoners and soldiers looked upon corporal punishment as something that was perfectly normal. If a soldier did something wrong, he too was given several lashes. And a few days later this same soldier would salute the corporal, sergeant or officer who had knocked him down as though nothing had happened. The dictator Gómez had ruled them in this way for years and years, and it was from him that they had inherited the barbarous system. It had become customary - so much so that a civil administrator would punish the people under his authority with a whip.

I was on the eve of being set free; and the reason for this was that there had been a revolution. The president of the republic, General Angarita Medina, had been overthrown by a half military and half civilian coup d'état; he was one of the greatest liberals in the history of Venezuela, and he was so good so democratic, that he had been both unable and unwilling to withstand this rising. It seems he had finally refused to let Venezuelans to shed one another's blood to keep him in power. This great democratic soldier certainly knew nothing about what went on in El Dorado.

At all events, a month after the revolution all the officers were changed. The authorities began an inquiry into the so-called purge and into the death of the Colombian. The governor and his brother-in-law vanished, and they were replaced by a lawyer who had also been a diplomat.

'Yes, Papillon, I'm going to set you free tomorrow. You'd like you to take that poor Picolino with you. I know you take an interest in him. He has no official identity, so I'll give him one. As for you, here's a cédula, an identity-card like all in order, and it's made out in your real name. The captain these: you must live somewhere in a small village for a probationary period, not so that the police can supervise, but so that we can see what progress you make and how you can manage in life. If the administrator of the district gives you a certificate of good behaviour at the end of that time, as I'm sure he will, then that will put an end to your confinement, your obligatory residence. I think Caracas would be a perfect town for you. At all events, you're legally authorized to live in this country. Your past doesn't mean anything to us. It's up to you to show that you're worthy of being given this chance of once more becoming a respectable member of society. I hope that before five years have gone by you will be my compatriot - that naturalization will give you a new country of your own. May God be with you. Thank you for being willing to take care of that poor helpless Pico lino. I can only let him out if someone gives a signed undertaking that he will look after him. Let's hope that some hospital will be able to cure him.'

It was at seven the next morning that I was to go out into real freedom, together with Picolino. My heart was flooded with warmth: at last I had escaped from the road down the drain, and now it was for good. I had been waiting for this for thirteen years: for now it was 18 October 1945.

I went down to my shed in the garden. I asked my friends to forgive me, but I just had to be alone. My feelings were too powerful for me to be able to express them with anyone there. I examined the identity-card the governor had given me: my photograph in the left-hand corner: on top, the number 1728629: valid from 3 July 1944. Plumb in the middle, my name: beneath it, my Christian name. On the back, date of birth: 16 November 1906. The identity-card was perfectly order, and it was even signed and stamped by the Director of the Identity Bureau. Status in Venezuela: resident. This was terrific: it meant I was domiciled in Venezuela. My heart beat wildly. I felt like going down on my knees and thanking God. You don't know how to pray, Papillon; you've never been baptized. What God are you going to thank, when you don't belong to any specific religion? The Jews? The Catholics? The Protestants? The Jews? The Mahdians? Which was I going to choose to address my prayers to? Which was I going to choose to address my prayers to, a prayer that I'd have to invent, since I knew none through. But why should I worry about which God to pray to on this particular day? When I had called upon Him during the course of my life, or even when I cursed Him, hadn't I always thought of the God of the Infant Jesus in His basket with the ass and the ox around Him? Did my subconscious mind still bear a grudge against those Colombian nuns? In that case, why not think just of the splendid, noble-hearted bishop of Curaçao, Mgr Irénée de Bruyne; or farther back still, of the good chaplain of the Conciergerie?

Tomorrow I would be free, completely free. In five years I would be a naturalized Venezuelan, for I was certain I should commit no wrong-doing upon this soil that had given me asylum and that had trusted me. In the life before me I must be twice as honest as anybody else.

For indeed, although I was innocent of the killing for which a public prosecutor, some cops and the twelve bastards of the jury had sent me to penal, they could only have done so because I was already something of a bad hat. It was because I was in fact outside the law that it was so easy for them to spin a web of falsehoods around my character. Opening other people's safes is not a really praiseworthy occupation and society has both the right and the duty to defend itself. I must honestly confess that the reason I was tossed down the drain was that I was a standing candidate for it. The fact that such a punishment was unworthy of a nation like France; the fact that although society has the duty of defending itself it does not have that of taking such ignoble revenge – all that is something else again. I could not wipe out my past just like that. I had to rehabilitate myself by my own efforts: first in my own eyes and then in those of others. So thank the God of the Catholics, Papi: promise Him something very important.

'Lord, forgive me if I do not know how to pray. Look down on me and You will see I don't possess words enough to express my gratitude to You for having brought me as far as this. It has been a hard struggle; making my way along the path inflicted upon me by other men has not been always very easy and the reason I have been able to overcome all these troubles and go on living in good health up to this time is certainly because of Your helping hand. Please let me show You that I am sincerely grateful for Your aid.'

'Renounce thy vengeance.'

Did I really hear it?

them? I don't know: but they came so suddenly, like a smack in the face, that I'd almost swear I really did hear them.

'Oh no! Not that! Don't ask me that. These people have made me suffer too much. How can You expect me to forgive those bent cops, or Polein, that perjured witness? How can I give up the idea of ripping out that inhuman lawyer's tongue? I can't do it. You're asking me too much. No, no, no. I'm sorry to offend You, but at no price whatsoever will I give up carrying out my revenge.'

I went outside: I was afraid of weakening and I didn't want to yield. I walked up and down my garden. Toto was curling the tips of the climbing beans round their stakes so that they should get a hold. They were all three there, Toto, the optimistic Parisian from the gutters of the rue de Lappe, Antartaglia, the Corsican-born pickpocket who had spent years relieving Parisians of their purses, and Deplanque, the guy from Dijon who'd killed a fellow-ponce, and they all came towards me. They were looking at me, and their faces were full of happiness because I was to be free at last. It would be their turn soon, no doubt.

'Didn't you bring a bottle of wine or rum from the village to celebrate being let out?'

'Forgive me. I was knocked all of a heap and I never even thought about it. Don't hold it against me. I'm very sorry I forgot.'

'No, no, there's nothing to be sorry about. I'll make us all a pot of coffee.'

'Brother, you're happy, because you're going to be free for good and all at last, after all these years of struggle. We're happy for you.'

'I hope your turn will come soon.'

'That's for sure,' said Toto. 'The captain told me that he was going to let one of us out each fortnight. What are you going to do once you're free?'

I hesitated for a second or two, but then, in spite of my dread of looking ridiculous in front of the relégué and these two lags, I bravely said, 'What am I going to do? Well, it's simple enough. I'll get a job and I'll go straight: for good. I'd be ashamed of committing a crime in this country that has put its trust in me.'

I was astonished when, instead of an ironic crack, I heard them all three say, 'I've made up my mind to go straight too.'

You're dead right, Papillon: it is too tough but we need it, and these Venezuelans deserve we should treat them right.'

I couldn't believe my ears. Toto, the tough from the Bastille gutters, with notions of this kind? It was staggering. Antartaglia, who'd spent his long life riding other people's pockets, reacting like this? It was wonderful. And it was even more amazing that Deplanque, a professional police should have no plans for finding a woman and putting her to work. We all burst out laughing.

'Well, what do you know! If you were to go back to Montmartre tomorrow and tell them in the Place Blanche nobody would believe you.'

'The men of our world would. They'd understand brother. It's only the squares who wouldn't agree. The great majority of Frenchmen won't have it that guys like us, with the kind of past we have behind us, can become decent citizens from every point of view. That's the difference between the Venezuelan nation and ours.'

I've already told you what the poor fisherman of Trapa had to say, when he was telling the administrator that a man was never wholly lost and that he must be given a chance so that with help he might go straight. These almost illiterate fishermen of the Gulf of Paria, away at the far end of the world, lost in the huge estuary of the Orinoco, have a humane philosophy that is lacking in a good many of our fellow-countrymen. For much material progress, a rat-race of a life a Sunday with only one ideal - more mechanical inventions, a life that grows easier and easier all the time, a higher standard of living. Lapping up scientific discoveries in much the same way that one laps up an ice-cream brings about a longing for greater comfort and a perpetual struggle to reach it. This strikes at people's hearts: it does away with pity, understanding and nobility. They no longer have the time to care for others, least of all habitual criminals. And even the authorities here at the back of beyond are unfeeling ones; for although they are responsible for public order they will nevertheless run the risk of getting into serious trouble in order to save a fellow man. And I think that is splendid.

I had a fine navy-blue suit given me by my grandfather who is now a colonel. A month back he had gone off to the military school, having passed the examination, one of the very few.

smiling defiantly. They talked of happier days and both laughed a little and cried a lot.

"You must forgive us, Richard," said Abel, "the Polish are a sentimental race."

"I know. My children are half Polish," said Richard.

Later that evening they dined together—magnificent roast veal, appropriate for the return of the prodigal daughter, said Abel.

He talked of the future and how he saw the progress of his group.

"We ought to have a Florentyna's in every hotel," he said. She laughed and agreed.

He told Richard of his sadness concerning his father, revealing in detail the mistakes he had made for so many years and how it had never crossed his mind even for a moment that William Kane could have been his benefactor, and how he would have liked one chance to thank him personally.

"He would have understood," said Richard.

"We met, you know, the day he died," said Abel.

Florentyna and Richard stared at him in surprise.

"Oh yes," said Abel. "We passed each other on Fifth Avenue—he had come to watch the opening of your shop. He raised his hat to me. It was enough, quite enough."

Abel had only one request of Florentyna. That she and Richard would accompany him on his journey to Warsaw in nine months' time for the opening of the latest Baron.

"Can you imagine," he said, again excited, his fingers tapping the side table. "The Warsaw Baron. Now there is a hotel that could only be opened by the president of the Baron Group."

During the following months the Kanes visited Abel regularly and Florentyna grew very close to her father again. Abel came to admire Richard and the common sense that tempered all his daughter's ambitions. He adored his grandson. And little Annabel was—what was that awful modern expression?—she was something else. Abel had rarely been happier in his life and began elaborate plans for his triumphant return to Poland to open the Warsaw Baron.
